HISTORICAL

The CENTURY was founded, and its first Constitution adopted, January 13, 1847. One hundred gentlemen engaged or interested in Letters and the Fine Arts had been invited to join in forming the Association, of which number forty-two accepted the invitation and became Founders. Forty-six others joined during the year.

The name, suggested by the number originally invited to be members, was the proposal of Edgar S. Van Winkle.

On March 7, 1857, it was incorporated by an Act of the Legislature, which was amended March 29, 1883.

From the spring of 1847 to the spring of 1849 it occupied rooms at No. 495 Broadway.

From the spring of 1849 to the spring of 1850 it occupied rooms at No. 435 Broome Street.

From the spring of 1850 to May, 1852, it occupied rooms at No. 575 Broadway.

From May, 1852, to the spring of 1857, it occupied the house at No. 24 Clinton Place (now No. 46 East 8th Street).

From the spring of 1857 to January 5, 1891, it occupied the house at No. 109 (old No. 42) East Fifteenth Street.

On January 10, 1891 it removed to its present club-house, No. 7 West Forty-third Street.

Successive amendments to the Constitution fixed the limit of resident membership as follows: March 5, 1853, 200 members; March 7, 1857, 250; May 7, 1859, 350; February 1, 1862, 400; April 7, 1866, 500; February 6, 1875, 600; December 5, 1885, 700; May 3, 1890, 800; February 6, 1892, 1000. The limit of non-resident membership has been fixed as follows: February 6, 1892, 300; December 3, 1921, 400; January 14, 1928, 500; June 3, 1941, 600; March 1, 1945, 700.

On May 4, 1901, John Bigelow and Parke Godwin, only surviving members of The Column, a literary society founded in 1825, presented to The Century the privileges of fellow-membership with them. The silver memorial column bears a lamp which since 1858 had burned at every meeting of The Column and is now lighted at each gathering of The Century.

REPORTS OF THE BOARD OF MANAGEMENT

THE Board of Management of The Century Association submits the following report for the year 1950:

The membership a year ago was 1601—971 resident and 630 non-resident. It is now 1592—948 resident and 644 non-resident members classified as follows:

Resident members paying dues	922
Non-resident members paying dues	613
Honorary member	1
Absent and other members exempt	56
	1592

During the year 76 members were elected, 43 resident and 33 non-resident members. Thirty-nine resident and 27 non-resident members died during the year. One non-resident member died during 1948 but his death was not reported until this year. Two non-resident members were reinstated. Four resident and 13 non-resident members resigned. Thirty-four resident members were transferred to the non-resident class and 10 non-resident members were transferred to the resident class.

At the end of the year there were 78 vacancies in the resident class and 87 vacancies in the non-resident class. There were 77 candidates in the resident class and 59 candidates in the non-resident class.

The membership a year ago was 1592—948 resident and 644 non-resident. It is now 1602—945 resident and 657 non-resident members classified as follows:

Resident members paying dues	911
Non-resident members paying dues	628
Honorary members	2
Absent and other members exempt	61
	1602

During the year 78 members were elected, 45 resident and 33 non-resident members. One non-resident member asked to have his qualification deferred, another non-resident member did not qualify. Twenty-four resident and 22 non-resident members died during the year. One resident and one non-resident member were reinstated. Seven resident and 11 non-resident members resigned. Twenty-five resident members were transferred to the non-resident class and 9 non-resident members were transferred to the resident class.

At the end of the year there were 88 vacancies in the resident class and 72 in the non-resident class. There were 78 candidates in the resident class and 44 candidates in the non-resident class.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON LITERATURE

OF the many matters considered at the 12 meetings of the Committee, the largest was the refurbishing of the Library quarters, concerning which the first notation was in the minutes of the meeting of January 4: "There was extended discussion of the appearance of the Library, and the consensus was that much could be done to remove the 'dingy look' without losing any of the traditional atmosphere." Numerous recommendations concerning painting, lighting, furniture, etc., were made and subsequently referred to the House-Art Committee and a Special Building Committee appointed by the Board of Management. A very generous gift recently made to the Association for decorating the Library ceiling was, with the approval of the anonymous donor, made available for the entire project, and Lawrence White agreed, on behalf of his firm, to undertake the work. The extraordinary transformation, highly satisfactory even to those most fearful of losing the "traditional atmosphere" of the room, was accomplished during the summer months.

There were other matters involving space. The handsome bookcases presented to the Association by Bassett Jones, were installed in the large dining-room on the fourth floor, also during the summer; some of our books, principally large sets, were transferred there. As a first step in providing "working library" space for author members, the balcony was cleared of the little-used books on the shelves there, and was equipped with three small tables, chairs, and lamps.

The Committee accepted with grateful approval the design for a new bookplate as prepared by Ernest Tyler at the request of the Committee, and the Board of Management took similar action.

Among the generous gifts of the year were those by Lincoln Cromwell and William Adams Delano. Mr. Cromwell presented to the Association a complete set of Punch, (1847-1949) in 215 volumes and the "National Edition of the works of Charles Dickens" in 40 volumes. From Mr. Delano, we received the 19-volume set of "The Private Papers of James Boswell from Malhide Castle," as well as a number of single-volume titles. Continuing his practice of several years, a Centurion who wishes to remain anonymous presented 19 volumes of the latest books of the Yale University Press, selected by the Committee, in memory of our fellow member, the late Clarence Day. The Committee also selected a number of welcome additions to our shelves from two collections, each of about 100 titles, offered to us by Dr. Frank L. Babbott and Dr. Harold S. Vaughan respectively.

Toward the end of the year, the Committee started a program of removing from the third floor shelves those books which, because of age, condition, or lack of use should be replaced by new editions or copies, rebound, removed to our increasingly useful stackroom under the sidewalk, or discarded. As to additions, it was decided to recommend to the new Committee a policy of purchasing more good books of temporary interest—"expendable" books, not intended for posterity. It is hoped that more attention will also be given to discovering and acquiring, preferably by gift, books for the rack now prominently labeled, "RECENT BOOKS BY CENTURIONS."

Among the housekeeping details, it should be reported that the Committee, with the cooperation of the Treasurer of the Association, inquired into and was satisfied by the fire-insurance protection of our books (some 17,000 volumes), made initial plans for a shelf list and a microfilm copy of our card catalogue, and purchased a noiseless typewriter for the Librarian.

The Committee wishes to express its appreciation to the Librarian, Mr. Theodore Bolton, for his always cheerful and conscientious service throughout another year, his twenty-fourth in the service of the Century.

THE principal task of the Committee on Literature in 1951 was to carry forward the program begun in 1950 for examining, shelf by shelf, books in the library with a view to rebinding, replacing or withdrawing volumes worn from use or superseded by newer works on the same subject. This work has been carried through the Graham Library and the volumes shelved on the north side of the reading room. In all, 35 volumes have been rebound, 75 volumes were replaced by new editions, and 1,800 volumes have been withdrawn and exchanged for copies in better condition or newer titles.

At the same time the Committee has been concerned with a clearer formulation of policy for guidance in developing the Library. It respectfully offers the following summation of its conclusions on this head:

In the judgment of the Committee, the Library of The Century Association should provide for daily use of the members the following resources:

1. A fair selection of the important daily and weekly newspapers of the English-speaking world together with representative weeklies published in France, Germany, Italy and the Scandinavian countries.

2. A reasonably good selection of the leading non-technical journals published in English and French, this selection to reflect the wide-ranging interests of the members of the Association.

3. A modest and manageable selection of current literature, including fiction, chosen with regard to topical interest rather than lasting significance. Much of the material in this category might well be discarded a few years after its purchase.

4. A general working reference library in the fields of art, architecture, belles lettres, history, biography, geography and science—designed to serve the non-professional needs of a diverse company of gentlemen with a common interest in the arts, letters, science and public affairs. The reference section (and it should be noted that the word "reference" is being used here in a very broad sense) of the Library must necessarily be built on the assumption that professional or vocational reference needs of members of the Club will be satisfied by other and larger libraries in the city.

5. A fair number of books, contemporary and otherwise, calculated to amuse and distract a tired man who is in no mood to improve his mind or to increase his store of useful information. This is the category which the late Henry James designated as "curious and entertaining."

The Committee notes with satisfaction and appreciation completion of twenty-five years of faithful and effective service of the librarian, Mr. Theodore Bolton.

The Library continues to benefit by notable gifts of members. The names of the members who have made donations to the Library during the years 1950-1951 are:

REPORTS OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE

1950

IN 1950, The Centennial Building Committee was authorized by the membership to undertake the remodeling of the kitchen. The dining-room was closed for the months of July and August to permit the necessary changes. A committee, with Geoffrey Platt as chairman, directed the work, and the kitchen with new equipment throughout was opened for inspection at a club dinner in early October.

Our chef, M. Fantin, and his aids, are now working with a modern range, stainless steel tables, an up-to-date dish washing machine and new refrigeration plant. The walls are tiled and fluorescent lighting has been installed.

A dumbwaiter for use in serving all floors was placed in operation.

The gift of a generous Centurion, who prefers to remain anonymous, made possible the considerable refurbishing of the Library. A new skylight, new chandeliers and new reading lamps were installed. The ceiling was painted and a molding added. The changes and new decoration bring out the architectural beauty of the room. Centurion Lawrence Grant White directed the work on the Library.

The fourth floor dining-room was redecorated and handsome walnut bookcases, the gift of Centurion Bassett Jones, add to the attractiveness of the room.

A general housecleaning was undertaken during the major alterations and this work was done by our own staff, under Mr. Marchand's supervision.

Work on the Platt Library was completed.

The meetings throughout the year were as follows:

January—In memory of our members who died during the year.

February—Dr. Chu Memg, Director of Chinese Institute in America, addressed the meeting and exhibited the technicolor films describing the ancient art of Chinese Paintings and Folk Dancing.

March—Discussion of a proposed amendment to the Constitution.

April—In honor of Centurion Henry L. Stimson, fellow members Dwight David Eisenhower, John W. Davis, and Harvey H. Bundy spoke. A transcript of the proceedings was published and copies sent to members.

May—Centurion Brendan Gill of the New Yorker staff spoke on the first twenty-five years of that lively magazine.

June—Report of Centennial Building Committee.

October—The new kitchen and redecorated library were opened for inspection after a special club dinner.

November—Dinner for new members—Geoffrey Parsons made the address of welcome.

December—Centurion Bassett Jones addressed the meeting on the "History of Numbers."

THE House Committee faced the usual problems in 1951—increased costs of food and services and higher wages. In order to meet the budget it was necessary to increase the surcharge on house charges and practice certain economies such as suspending bar and restaurant service on Sundays during July and August.

Under Geoffrey Platt's direction the old Committee Room off the Art Gallery was redecorated and made available as a private dining-room. The walls have been hung with Century medals and it will be known henceforth as the Medal Room. Mr. Platt also supervised the installation of new windows in the dining-room and painting of the back stairway as well as the usual replacements and repairs throughout the building. For the kitchen a large freezing cabinet was purchased. We conformed to the Civil Defence order and established first aid stations and shelters.

The House Committee is grateful to Paul Kieffer and his Wine Committee for its careful supervision of our wine cellar.

The House Committee acknowledges on behalf of The Century Association the following gifts from members during the year 1951:

Flowers for the dining-room from Stuart W. Jackson
Green Mint and terragon from Charles Downing Lay Brook trout from Edward R. Finch
Pig from Alfred Geiffert, Jr.
Fresh corn from Frank C. Nicodemus, Jr.
Fresh salmon from Allen Evarts Foster
Maple syrup from Walter Kilham, Jr.
Fresh salmon from John W. Davis
Glass containers for Billiard Room from Clifton P. Williamson
Lobster from Roscoe H. Hupper

The January meeting, as usual, was held in memory of Centurions who died during the year. At subsequent meetings the following speakers, all Centurions, were heard:

February—Dr. Hu Shih—"Communist China"
March—Frederick L. Allen—"The Big Change—America since 1900"
April—Edward Ringwood Hewitt—"A Visit to Spain"
May—Oscar R. Houston—"Nepal and the South Face of Mt. Everest"
November—Henry Allen Moe—Address of welcome to new members
December—Walter Millis—"The Forrestal Diaries"

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON MUSIC

MUSICIANS of the Century can finally look their fellow creative artists squarely in the face now that music has been raised to the status of an art with a budget and a committee of its own.

The Committee was first appointed in 1949 but did not function effectively until the spring of 1950 when three programs were presented on the Sunday afternoons of February 26, March 19, and April 16. Each program was related to the performing or the composing talents within the membership of the Association. The first was a violin recital by our distinguished fellow Centurion, Albert Spalding, who graciously contributed his services to inaugurate the series. A song recital by Uta Graf and a concert by the New Music Quartet included compositions by Centurions Randall Thompson and Quincy Porter.

Grateful mention should be made of the contribution of an anonymous Centurion who provided for the necessary renovation of the Club's Steinway Grand in preparation for the series.

THE Music Committee arranged three concerts for 1951. The first of these, a piano recital was appropriately given by our fellow Centurion, Bruce Simonds, Dean of Yale Music School. Mr. Simonds produces beautiful sonorities from the instrument, and plays with a complete sense of dedication to music, and his sensitive readings of Mozart, Beethoven, César Franck and Chopin were deeply appreciated.

The second concert was given by the Albeneri Trio, the third by the Juilliard String Quartet, both of which organizations have distinguished themselves in professional circles for large repertoire and fine ensemble. All of the concerts were well attended, the employees of the Club setting a high standard of efficiency and hospitality.

The report of the Committee on Music is the last of the reports of the Board of Management.

In January 1950 it was decided to separate the work of preparing memorials from the Secretary's office. To carry on this important function the post of Historian was created. The reports of the Historian for the years 1950 and 1951 follow.

ROGER BURLINGAME

CENTURY MEMORIALS

1950

Irving Bacheller

Irving Bacheller was elected to the Century in 1915; and he died February 24, 1950. He was ninety years old. All his long life he was an active, gregarious, good-humored man: "The most human human-being that ever lived," as one of his friends remarked.

He was a graduate of St. Lawrence College, near his birthplace at Pierrepont, N.Y. He was always interested in his alma mater, and this interest was later shared by Rollins College at Winter Park, Florida, of which he became a trustee in 1922.

In 1898 he became Sunday Editor of "The World." When a "World" executive heard he was planning to write a novel, he told him: "I don't want a man who has a novel on his chest. Get it off and then come back to work."

The novel was "Eben Holden"; and it sold so well that its author never returned to newspaper work.

Whenever he was in the City, Mr. Bacheller made the Century his headquarters. A person of regular habits, he came to the Club each morning and retired to his favorite chair in the northwest corner of the Graham Library to write.

Many of his books were written in the Club and his gratitude to the Librarian of the Century is expressed in the preface to some of his later volumes.

There was nothing he liked so much as to be joined by his friends after luncheon for leisure talk in the Graham Library.

Later in the day, he would go to the Billiard Room for a game at which he had considerable skill.

He was a distinguished man of letters and an old-fashioned gentleman.

Mark Barr

Mark Barr was a physicist and mathematician, brilliant in his profession, and with the unusual capacity of translating the most complex aspects of science and numbers out of the language of symbols into the clearest English. It was said of him that he understood the Einstein theory of relativity at a time when few others had grasped it. Those of us who remember their conversations with Mark Barr will recall that, while he was talking at least, they almost understood it themselves.

Barr held a number of unorthodox beliefs: one was that the genius of Edison had been greatly exaggerated. He used to say that only one so-called Edison invention could uniquely be credited to him: the phonograph. He talked often about what he called "the obsession of method"—the compelling habit of certain intellectual processes which obscured the truth to otherwise brilliant minds.

Barr turned his talents and education into practical channels and for many years designed electrical calculating machinery. For this he was awarded the Paris Gold Medal. Much of this work was done in England and Barr lived for many years in London where he had a wide acquaintance.

When, finally, he returned to New York to live, the Century became practically his home. He is remembered by many Centurions for his wit and his large fund of good stories.

He was elected to the Century in 1925 and died on December 15, 1950 at the age of 79.

Edgar Howard Boles

Edgar Howard Boles was born in Philadelphia, and he was elected to the Century in 1940. His early aim was to be a musician; a concert pianist and an interpreter of the Works of Johann Sebastian Bach. Restrained, however, by what he regarded as lack of power due to a boyhood accident to his hand, he shifted to the law, although music as an art and a resource continued always to be a dominating influence of a life of richly varied interests. His under-graduate work was at Haverford College, where he graduated in 1902, his law work at the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1924 he was awarded an honorary degree of Doctor of Laws by Muhlenberg College: a recognition, in his home State of Pennsylvania, of a distinguished career.

He had long been identified with the highly specialized field of railroad law, first as an understudy of our late fellow-Centurion, Ira A. Place, in the New York Central Railroad, and finally as Vice-President and General Counsel of the Lehigh Valley Railroad—a position he relinquished in 1926 to become President of the General Reinsurance Company. At various times he held important positions outside the line of regular duty. For many years he served as the President and Chairman of the New York Post-Graduate Hospital; and he was President of St. Andrew's Club, a Director of the Bach Festival at Bethlehem, and the active Chairman of the Railway Conference, a group of Railway General Counsel having offices in and about New York.

Those of us who were fortunate enough a number of years back to listen in on the radio program known as "Music is My Hobby" might have been well rewarded by hearing Edgar H. Boles play faultlessly, and even with a touch of genius, a Chopin nocturne or a Bach fugue or some other composition that could have been mastered only by years of application on the part of one possessed of rare gifts.

He died February 4, 1950.

Albert Greene Borden

Albert G. Borden was elected to the Century in 1936. He died on January 26, 1950.

All his life he was in the insurance business. He wrote about it, and he practised it, and he became a very important figure in it. He lived in South Orange, where he was one of the leaders in the community.

He was interested in statistics, and he devised tables and a system for classifying Army officers for the War Department which were exceedingly useful and established new standards for promotion.

He was active in the work of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra. He loved music.

Thomas Wilson Bowers

Thomas W. Bowers was elected to the Century in 1942. He died on March 16, 1950.

He graduated from Yale in 1910, and from the Harvard Law School in 1913. He practised law in Washington, and Chicago, and New York, successively; but in 1922 he went into banking.

The extent and variety of his business interests were astonishing. He contributed to the development of the oil fields of the Southwest, the canneries of the Pacific seaboard, the coal deposits of Indiana, and transportation by sea and air to Europe. He seemed to know thoroughly all sections of the country. He had friends everywhere and they were devoted to him.

His manner was simple and direct, and he was obviously free from guile. He had an explosive, hearty way of speaking that seemed to reflect his interest and sincerity, and companions were gayer for his presence.

He was a friendly man, and his insight and concern for others were expressed in thoughtful acts of generosity and kindness. His energy was unbounded; and he not only worked hard himself but inspired others to do likewise.

He was a civilized, educated American.

Isaiah Bowman

Isaiah Bowman was elected to the Century in 1932. He died on January 6, 1950.

He was a geographer; and he came to be the greatest geographer in the world. He was the most efficient coordinator of topography, population pressures and economic resources that has ever lived. His philosophy, however, could not be contained within the traditional concept of geography, and he was forever explaining that exploration includes trying to find out what other people think and feel, and how they work and live. He went up and down in the earth, and walked to and fro in it; and he looked with eyes that saw, and he listened with understanding ears that heard.

In 1919 he went to Paris, with President Wilson, as chief territorial specialist to the American Commission to Negotiate Peace. The Commission was loaded with experts of all kinds—many of them professors filled with vanity and self-importance. In this collection of over-sensitive individualists, Bowman was conspicuous for his common-sense and executive ability. He was apparently completely devoid of envy or jealousy, always interested in getting done the matter immediately in hand, and always contributing to the solution of a situation rather than to his own self-satisfaction.

In 1915 he became director of the American Geographical Society and he occupied this position for twenty years. During this time the Society mapped the entire continent of South America. The Society's map collection was recognized as the best in the country. Its publication "The Geographical Review," under his direction, became one of the country's leading scientific journals.

He left the Society in 1935 to become President of Johns Hopkins. He cut the annual deficit from $164,000 to nothing. He helped raise $1,000,000 in endowments. He strengthened the undergraduate departments, particularly those devoted to physics, chemistry, biology, English and geography.

As a companion he was a wonderful person to talk with or work with. His mind was marvellously clear. He quickly apprehended a problem, and then formulated it so that everyone else understood it. Then he would proceed directly to the heart of the matter without circumlocution or self-justifications. His wit was quick, and he always knew what he was talking about.

Once he was testifying, as an expert geographer, in a law suit relating to the boundary between Texas and Oklahoma. The course of the Red River was the matter at issue, and Bowman was being cross-examined by a hostile lawyer.

After drawing from Bowman a prediction as to a future position of the shifting channel of the Red River, the attorney seemingly lured the witness into the fatal commitment that he was quite willing to "prophesy." Somewhat to his surprise, the victim showed no hesitancy in accepting the bait.

"May I ask, then," continued the sardonic lawyer, "whether you regard yourself as a major or merely a minor, prophet?"

"I am called a major prophet," responded Bowman.

The would-be tormenter paused, surveyed the court, and prepared for the kill. But his next question, demanding an explanation as to why an alleged man of science was willing to pose as a prophet, brought forth the riposte that devastated his whole attack and threw the court into a titter. It was only this: "I am called a major prophet, because my name is Isaiah."

Bowman was stocky in build and sometimes gave an impression of severity. But he knew how and when to relax, and used to delight the family by rough-housing on the floor with his five little grand-daughters whom he called "Gumdrops."

His influence on the thinking of this country has been profound. And if we are to emerge some day from this tyranny which overhangs us, it will be largely due to the adoption of his methods and approach to the great problems that divide the world.

Otis Treat Bradley

Otis Bradley was elected to the Century in 1948. He died on November 22, 1950.

He was a lawyer; and at the time he died he was president of the New York State Bar Association. He was also Chairman of the Board of Trustees and an Elder of the Madison Avenue Christian Church, and a trustee of Union Theological Seminary.

He graduated from Yale in 1915, and from the Harvard Law School in 1919. He was a wise legal adviser and he understood human problems, which implies qualities of the heart as well as of the mind. There was a dignity and purposefulness in his manner that had to be penetrated in order to know him well; but once one got beneath this shell he was an intensely human, sympathetic and understanding friend.

He was exceedingly involved with education, and was a trustee of Union College, the Chapin School for Girls, and the Buckley School for Boys. He loved music, books and good wines. He was a collector; particularly of rare editions of the Bible. Perhaps nothing is more touching than the fact that a distinguished dealer in rare books flew over from London for his funeral because of the intimate personal friendship between him and Otis Bradley.

He was a good man and a true Christian, and a very noble inner spirit moved and governed him.

Charles Henry Breed

Dr. Charles H. Breed, a Centurion only since 1943, was, all his life, a typical school man in the finest tradition of that honorable calling. After graduating from Lawrenceville and from Princeton, he taught Latin at Lawrenceville for twenty-four years. Then he organized and became the first head master of the Country Day School in Providence, Rhode Island. Four years later he was called to be head master of Blair Academy in Blairstown, New Jersey.

An illustration both of his knowledge of boys and of his dry humor was his remark that if he ever got a boy on the carpet for some misdemeanor, and could not tell him how he could have committed it without getting caught, he would resign. When he finally did resign nineteen years later, it was, however, for the quite different reason of failing health.

For many years he was an enthusiastic and skillful amateur photographer. In particular, as each of many new schemes for color photography appeared, he experimented with it until he had mastered it, including not only exposure but development as well, with beautiful results.

He leaves many friends in the Century, and a host of loyal disciples.

Seaver Burton Buck

Buck was born in Greenwood, Maine, and graduated from the High School at Ellsworth. He then commenced to acquire funds to go to Harvard, and he took to teaching. He went to Harvard for two years, and then became a tutor in the family of Governor Carroll of Maryland. Returning to Harvard, he graduated in 1896.

He studied law for a year, and gave it up to become senior master at Hackley School in Tarrytown. In 1907 he and Mrs. Buck founded the Berkshire School at Sheffield, Massachusetts; and Buck continued as Headmaster of it till he retired in 1942. It was a good school, and he was a famous schoolmaster. He knew everybody, and everybody liked him.

He was a quiet, cultivated man, rather handsome with white hair and his black-ribboned pince-nez, clad informally in tweeds, and punctilious in manner. He had a pleasing voice and he spoke fastidiously, with a dry, down-east humor.

Schoolmastering is exceedingly important. It demands consecration, but the satisfactions are deep and real. Buck was perfectly fitted for it and was happy doing it. He had the respect of his fellows in the calling. Surely these are the imponderable elements of the good life.

Douglas Campbell

Douglas Campbell was elected to the Century in 1924. He died on February 6, 1950.

He graduated from Union College, Schenectady, in 1894, and from the Harvard Law School in 1897. He began practising law with Carter, Ledyard & Milburn; but after a few years he formed a firm of his own, Campbell, Harding & Pratt.

In the Spanish War Campbell was a private in the Rough Riders; and in World War I he was a captain of artillery and served overseas.

All his life he was a bachelor, and a most useful member of clubs, committees and commissions. He was an enthusiastic fox-hunter. At his ancestral home in Cherry Valley, he operated four dairy farms, and he was intensely interested in that part of the country.

He lived and practised law in New York, and he was a familiar figure at the Downtown Club. He was a tall, strong man, slow of speech, deliberate in his movements, and possessed of a gift for inspiring confidence.

Edward Capps

Edward Capps, distinguished classical scholar and teacher, editor and administrator, died on August 21, 1950, in Princeton. He had lived there since 1907, when he was invited to Princeton University to be Professor of Classics. Already at the University of Chicago he had achieved a high reputation as a scholar in the field of Greek dramatic literature, and had conducted excavations at the theatre of Ancient Eretria.

He was intensely interested then, as he was all his life, in making the classics available to the general reader both in the original and in English translation, and he was chosen American editor of the famous Loeb Classical Library with parallel texts in Latin or Greek and English.

As a professor at Princeton, Capps was an enormously vital and stimulating teacher who is best remembered, at least by some of his former students, for his full-blooded, masculine rendering of the robust humor of Aristophanes. Possessing uncommon physical energy he was a tremendous worker; and it was not unusual for him, at the height of his powers, to spend eighteen hours a day at his desk. But his activity extended far beyond academic life, and when Oxford conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters in 1946, the Public Orator greeted him as "a welcome guest whose threefold genius demands our threefold praise: as scholar, archaeologist and man of affairs."

Capps had served as Red Cross Commissioner to Greece in 1918, and in 1920 President Wilson appointed him Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Greece and Montenegro. His remarkable administrative ability was also deployed in other ways, both in the service of the Greek people, and of his own. For many years he was chairman of the Board of Trustees of Athens College, and Chairman of the Managing Committee of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens, the endowment of which, through vigorous personal effort, he increased more than threefold. He was influential in persuading Mr. Rockefeller to subsidize the important excavations of the Athenian Agora. And in this country he organized the American Friends of Greece.

After retiring from Princeton in 1935, Capps held the position of Visiting Professor at the Institute for Advanced Study until 1941. During his later years he continued to some extent his activity as a teacher, reading his favorite authors with advanced students, who testify to that same vigor of mind and contagious enthusiasm that had marked his teaching in earlier years. He continued to be editor of the Loeb Classical Library, and was working on the latest volumes of the series at the time of his death.

Capps was a man of powerful personality, with compelling eyes and resonant voice. He had generous instincts and a large imagination. No scholar of his generation did more to encourage the study of classical antiquity, and no American of our time has been a stauncher friend to Greece.

Joseph Collins

Joseph Collins was elected to the Century in 1901. He died on June 11, 1950.

He was a physician, and he was also a neurologist, psychiatrist, psychologist and author of many books. He took his medical degree at New York University in 1888, and after that he studied in Germany.

From 1897 to 1909 Dr. Collins was Professor of Neurology at the New York Post-Graduate Medical School. He also served on the staff of the City Hospital.

His important work in life was the organizing and making a reality of the Neurological Institute, now part of the Presbyterian Hospital Medical Center. His best-known book is probably "The Doctor Looks at Love and Life," published in 1926, in which he described America as suffering from "adult infantilism."

He was a witty man, with a sharp Irish tongue, witty rather than humorous as the Celt so often is. Once, on the witness stand, a lawyer was trying to show that Collins was not a psychiatrist, but was a neurologist, i.e., concerned only with nerve structure. He asked Collins if it was not true that he was merely a neurologist, pure and simple. Collins answered drily: "Always pure, but rarely simple."

Remembering his own early struggles to get an education, Dr. Collins, in his will, left the bulk of his very considerable property in trust, the income to be used to "enable students and cultured young men and women, who are ambitious and determined and who are without sufficient means, to study medicine."

Walter Johannes Damrosch

Walter Damrosch died on December 22, 1950. He was next to the senior member of the Century, having been elected in 1888 when he was twenty-six.

He was a magical figure—made of different stuff from other men. When he talked about music, it became fearfully exciting. It was almost like some miraculous drug. He was sure music was for everybody—everybody. When one was in adversity, it was a comfort. When one was happy, it was a universal language of joy and brotherhood.

He was right. And he devoted his life to spreading this gospel: with astounding success. He was so confident, so debonair, so much more urgent and forceful than the rest of us, that it is pleasantly reassuring to think he was not always thus. In 1883 his father was conducting the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. He was a player in it, but was so paralysed with fright that he could not clash the cymbals at the proper time.

He was a promotor, a conductor, an impresario, a composer, a teacher and a musician, and he was first-class at each of these callings. In 1942 the Club meeting on April 2 was wholly devoted to observing his completion of four-score years. It was a marvellous party. The musicians of the Club played from the works of Beethoven, Debussy and Damrosch —mostly Damrosch—and the old gentleman himself sat at the piano and eclipsed them all. He had a wonderful time.

If there is a life to come, be sure we shall hear his voice there, and clasp his hand, and feel his magic once again.

Frank Parker Day

Dr. Day was elected to the Century in 1931, and died July 30, 1950. He was a scholar, soldier, writer, and teacher and exceedingly competent at all these callings.

He graduated from Mount Allison College, Sackville, New Brunswick, in 1903, and was that college's first Rhodes Scholar. He graduated from Oxford with honors in English.

When World War I broke out, he took leave of absence from the faculty of Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburgh, and devoted himself to recruiting and training the 185th Infantry Battalion, Cape Breton Highlanders. He served through the war with them, and was mustered out in 1919 as lieutenant-colonel.

In 1926 he became professor of English at Swarthmore; and he was serving in that post when he was named president of Union College in 1929. Like most mature people, he believed that many of the evils attendant on college athletics could be corrected if colleges ceased to look to their sports as sources of profit. Furthermore he had the courage to say this and to act on it: nor was he moved by outcries or denunciation.

At Union he introduced a system of honors courses, strengthened the faculty, reorganized the student government, and started the organization of the college on a divisional rather than a departmental basis. Unfortunately, his health began to fail, and in 1933 he resigned without having had the satisfaction of himself working out his program to the full.

He was a gallant man, filled with enthusiasm and intelligence, endowed with understanding and leadership.

Stephen Pierce Duggan

Dr. Duggan was associated with City College for thirty-five years, rising to the rank of professor of political science and dean of the School of Education. During World War I he conceived the idea of promoting world peace through international education and exchange scholarships. To this end he founded the Institute of International Education, and after 1928 devoted himself exclusively to this.

He was a living refutation of the popular superstition that a scholar can never be an able administrator and that a college professor has, at best, limited practical judgment. For Dr. Duggan was not only a scholar with a wide appreciation of scholarship: he brought to the Institute of International Education and to such ad hoc bodies as the Emergency Committee in Aid of Displaced Foreign Scholars the instinct and talent of true leadership. Those who were privileged to work with him in some of the various public and semi-public responsibilities to which his life was given found a man of clear mind and firm purpose who had the knack of getting things done smoothly and expeditiously, with a minimum of friction and misunderstanding.

It was always a satisfaction to see him in action. His mind was like a searchlight that could be brought to play on one field after another. He was a superb judge of intellectual ability, and he had a quick imagination in estimating the capacity and promise of men. He had, too, a rare gift of lucidity, and a faculty not only to see the point at issue but to dissect it from its extraneous coverings. Having brought it to light, he clarified it and held it up for inspection, thus confining the debate to essential principles.

And with it all, he was a genuinely modest man. Although his opinions were strong and well defined, they were clothed in a tolerant kind of understanding. He could be persistent in argument, but he was never dogmatic, never arbitrary, and certainly never harsh. He had the gentleness of the true scholar, the detachment and forbearance of those who have faced ideas on many fronts. He knew intuitively what many of us find difficult to learn: that the willing acceptance of life, with all its visitations and changes, is, in the last analysis, the distinguishing characteristic of the man who is master of himself.

Edwin Rogers Embree

Edwin R. Embree gave all of his adult life to good causes and much of it to the development of the philosophy and practice of organized philanthropy. As a foundation executive, he will be remembered for the freshness of mind and of spirit with which he directed the disposition of Julius Rosenwald's great fortune, and for the courage which he brought to a life-long fight against racial discrimination in America.

Embree was President of the Rosenwald Fund, and under the terms of Mr. Rosenwald's bequest, his Trustees were required to expend both the income and the capital of the Fund within twenty-five years after its creation. Embree entirely shared Rosenwald's belief that perpetual trusts were bad in principle, and that each generation should be counted on to create its own capital surplus for the maintenance and advancement of the good life. As President of the Foundation he not only saw that the Trustees complied with the letter of Mr. Rosenwald's instructions but also with the spirit. The result was that both the Fund and its President were liquidated in 1948—some years short of the deadline.

In the ordinary social traffic of life, Embree was a gay and charming companion, capable of both gentleness and affection. He wrote and spoke with grace and force, and was much called upon to do both. His American Negroes, published in 1942, tells more in seventy pages about the American color problem than any three-volume work published before or since.

Embree died in New York on February 21, 1950, not quite ten years after his election to the Century. Like many another Centurion he had "retired" from the Rosenwald Fund into full-time service, first with the Liberia Foundation, and later with the philanthropic enterprises of John Hay Whitney. Death came to him with merciful quickness.

Charles Jarvis Fay

The Century suffered the loss of an esteemed and highly colorful member with the death of Charles J. Fay. He was elected a member in 1916, and his deep interest in and affection for the Club never abated, although recently the infirmities of advancing years kept him away from most Century gatherings.

Charles Fay was a distinct personality. Not only was he a man of outstanding ability, but he possessed a truly warm, kind heart. He was endowed with a sparkling wit and an endearing charm of manner. No one can ever forget his bushy red hair and genial countenance, his homely Yankee talk, and the transparent genuineness of his affections.

For half a century Fay was active in the legal world, and he came rightly to rank as one of the leaders of the New York Bar, but he never lost his interest in the welfare and advancement of youth. This was a dominating influence through his long life. Ever ready to help along some young man who came to him for advice or help, many profited from his vast wisdom and inspiring personality. Fay's satisfaction over the success and accomplishments of those many years his junior, whom he had so guided, was far greater than what he derived from his own no small achievements. He had a host of friends, and was beloved by all who knew him.

Fay spent most of his early life at Hartford, Connecticut, where his father, Gilbert O. Fay, Yale 1859, was a pioneer in the teaching of the deaf and dumb. After he graduated from Yale with high honors in 1893, Fay taught school for a time, and then entered Columbia Law School where he graduated in 1899. He was a wise and exceedingly competent lawyer, commanding the complete confidence of clients and the respect of the Bar. He never did a cheap or mean thing.

Charley Fay's career was eventful and successful: but what stands out in perspective are his changeless traits of character—his generous help to others younger than he, and his sincere and lively interest in their welfare.

Andrew Green Foord

Andrew Green Foord was elected to the Century in 1920. He died on March 16, 1950. He lives in the grateful memories of hundreds of former patients whom he helped and befriended.

He was born in Brooklyn, the son of John Foord, the editor of "The Times" from 1875-83; and was named for his father's friend, Andrew Green, a leading citizen to whom New York owes a debt as a principal advocate of Central Park.

Following an apprenticeship at Mount Sinai Hospital, Dr. Foord founded in 1906 his noted sanitarium "Nonkonahwa" in the Catskills. There for thirty-five years, until his retirement in 1941, he ministered to those worn down by the stress of modern life.

Of immediate Scotch descent, the doctor had the best qualities of that great people. He was independent to a degree, and had little use for those who would not even try. But he was also a highly sensitive judge of human nature, and the kindest of men, with a great gift for friendship.

His forte as a physician was his ability not simply to alleviate and patch but to restore. If the patient would only give him time, he was often able to bring back to even greater usefulness men and women who had almost lost hope.

Many hard-working and distinguished men have looked back to their weeks or months under his experienced care as a turning point in their lives, from which not only physical but spiritual health flowed into them.

He was a superb doctor for his special work—the repair and restoration of worn-out bodies and minds. Beyond that, his character was such as of itself to serve as an inspiration. He commanded in equal measure respect and affection; and he left a record of devoted service that will long be remembered.

Edmund Vivian Gabriel

Sir Vivian Gabriel was elected to the Century in 1929. He died on February 13, 1950.

He held an M.A. degree and a D.C.L. from Cambridge University. In 1897 he entered the Indian Civil Service, serving in Bengal, Rajputana and Central India becoming Assistant Political A.D.C. at the India Office in London in 1902. During the Coronation Durbar of 1902-1903 he came to the notice of King George V, and from that time a friendship grew up between the King and himself which continued until the King's death. King George V appointed him a Gentleman Usher at Buckingham Palace—a position he occupied most of his life. He was a well known figure in Court circles, and at the last Coronation he led the Queen's procession up the nave of Westminster Abbey. Ceremony appealed to him greatly, particularly the pageantry of State functions which he considered enriched life and did something to counteract the external drabness of to-day. His life in India, then, as now, caste and class ridden, must have affected his whole outlook on life; it was second nature to him to command and to expect unquestioning obedience. There is no doubt that he was frequently shocked by the disorder, inefficiency and lack of recognition (let alone respect) of established values which he saw around him in recent years.

Sir Vivian was well endowed with that social graciousness, that easy, but not effervescent, courtesy which we may now read about but seldom encounter. He could hardly have been otherwise in the light of his career, but he did not suffer fools and tiresome people with patience. He was an untiring worker and had a genius for the orderly presentation of facts.

He was essentially the type of Englishman whom we would expect to see living the cultured and well ordered life of the English Manor House.

Vivian Gabriel was a man whose charming, gentle and courtly personality made for him many happy friendships. His distinctive, rather Edwardian, style of dress and manner gave him a quality infrequently encountered in these days in either Britain or America, and his experience of the world and wide travels further enriched and illuminated a mind already rich in scholarship, in humanity, and in intelligence.

A Knight Bachelor, he was a Companion of the Order of the Star of India and of the Order of St. Michael and St. George; in addition he was a Commander of the Royal Victorian Order and of the Order of the British Empire, a Grand Commander of the Order of Astor, a Knight Commander of Santo Sepolcro, Commander of the Orders of Orange Nassau and St. Agatha, and Officer of the Orders of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus and of the Order of the Crown of Italy.

John Mark Glenn

John M. Glenn was elected to the Century in 1909. He died on April 20, 1950.

He was born in Baltimore; and he remarked once that his first arrival in New York—when he was five years old—involved his stepping off a ferry boat with his father and mother, and finding himself in the middle of the Draft Riots.

He graduated from Washington and Lee University in 1879, and from the Law School of the University of Maryland in 1882. The memory of the nobility of General Lee and the gallantry and self-sacrifice of the boys of the Virginia Military Institute, to which his attention was directed at college, profoundly influenced him. He was endowed with vision to make great plans and with the tenacity to carry them out. He demanded no credits for himself, but gave much to others.

Named general director of the Russell Sage Foundation at its establishment in 1907 he served till 1931, and thereafter was a trustee till 1948. Early in this work he suggested to Mrs. Sage that the Foundation should be "first on investigation, and second on education."

The Foundation's income was spent largely for those two purposes, both during Glenn's term of office and thereafter. He built up its child-welfare and child-placing services, established the study of women's work in industry, and conducted many other activities of similar nature. His guiding principle was to choose good people and then back them up in their activities.

When World War I broke out, Glenn dedicated Leonard P. Ayres and his statistical staff to war service. He was aware that the kind of statistical service that staff could give was essential, and that it would be some time before the war organization itself could put such a staff together. He considered the Foundation was making a "contribution to the improvement of social and living conditions" by making this research possible.

As a person, Glenn was a quiet and reserved man, very thoughtful, but without any dramatic qualities.

David Marvin Goodrich

David Goodrich graduated from Harvard in 1898. He was captain of the crew. The Spanish War was just beginning, and he immediately enlisted in the Rough Riders as a private. He was mustered out a 1st lieutenant.

He was executive head of one of America's great industrial organizations, the B. F. Goodrich Company, and a director of many other enterprises. Notwithstanding his busy life, he never declined an interview no matter how humble the applicant—whether it were a young man seeking advice on a career or a struggling inventor seeking recognition. He had a fine gift for literary expression, and was known to help an author turn a dull chapter into one that was alive and vibrant.

Goodrich's kindly manner was the natural and spontaneous expression of a noble and generous mind. All men that he came in contact with seemed to be his friends: the bootblack, the corner policeman, the waiter, the elevator operator, up to the highest executive in the land. The essential kindliness of this man was communicated in every word he spoke. He had a sympathetic regard for the feelings of others, and his understanding of those with whom he differed and his consideration in expressing his own point of view were rare and engaging traits. He took great delight in the achievements of his friends.

When the First World War came he went to Officers Training Camp at Plattsburgh. He was commissioned Major of Infantry, and ordered to Camp Dix. There he was assigned to duty at the Third Training School for Officers and served as senior instructor to the end of the course. He finished his service in the First World War as Lieutenant-Colonel.

For his public service, he was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal (U.S.); Chevalier of the Legion of Honor (France); Commander of the Order of Prince Danilo I (Montenegro); Officer of the Royal Order of the Redeemer (Greece); Chevalier of the Order of the Crown of Italy.

He was modest and kind and gallant.

Albert Herter

Albert Herter was elected to the Century in 1894, when he was 23 years old. He died February 15, 1950. He was born in New York, and was the last survivor of the original class that began studies at the Browning School in 1888. In 1938 he was the guest of honor at a dinner at the Waldorf marking the fiftieth anniversary of the School. His father, who had studied in Paris, gave him his initial art training, and he later studied with Carroll Beckwith and in various Paris ateliers.

He was recognized as a first-class portrait painter and a muralist, and among his work are five murals in the State House in Boston.

For many years he had a large house at Wainscott, near Easthampton, Long Island. The house was on a small lake, and when he wanted to rest he would board an elaborate gondola, quite in the Venetian type, and sally forth on a round of the lake.

He did a set of murals depicting the stories in the setting of Ivanhoe for one of the senior societies at Yale. When the time came to install the murals the members were not going to let him into the clubhouse to look at them. So he told them that if he were not admitted the murals would not go up. They ended by admitting him.

He was very fond of flowers and painted them beautifully; and perhaps this was one of the reasons which led him to live in California so much of the time toward the end of his life. He was always a most agreeable companion, and knew almost everyone of his day worth the knowing as artists go.

Edward Jackson Holmes

Holmes was born in Boston, and he lived there all his life. He was a solid citizen; and that is just what he wanted to be.

He graduated from Harvard in 1895, and from the Law School in 1899: but he never really bothered much with law. His father was deeply interested in art, and desired that his son should be. Of his father, Ned Holmes said:

> "He had an extraordinary gift for making history live. He took me to Athens and Rome when I was ten years old, and made the ancient Greeks and Romans more real to me than my own living friends.
> "He made me feel the fire of the spirit in temples, cathedrals, statues, paintings, and the importance of museums as preservers of our world inheritance. So, when circumstances permitted me to do what I wanted, I gave my whole thought and life to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. I was appointed a trustee of the Museum in 1911, and director in 1925. I resigned as director in 1934, and since then have been president."

He travelled all over the world. On a steamer going from Rangoon to Singapore he met his future wife, Mary Beaman, of New York, who was travelling around the world with her mother and father.

He always maintained a responsible interest in civic questions, and he served as a traffic policeman during the Boston police strike in 1919. When, in 1950, he died he was President of the Boston Museum, and he had been for many years, and to him must be ascribed a generous share in the glory of that great institution.

Franklin Ferguson Hopper

Franklin F. Hopper was a librarian, and he became Director of the New York Public Library.

He graduated from Princeton in 1900 and then he studied library work at the Pratt Institute. He worked in the Congressional Library, the Carnegie Library in Pittsburgh, and the Public Library in Tacoma; and thus he came to know the country from coast to coast, north to south, happily free from provincialism.

He was a slight man—almost frail—but he harbored a forceful spirit that was anything but cloistered. He had a genius for making and keeping friends; and his thorough understanding that diverse communities had diverse ways of doing things and looking at things, and that all might be good though different, was one of the secrets of his success in dealing with men and problems.

When he became Director of the New York Public Library he began his term by discarding the roll-top desk and swivel chair of his predecessors. He tried, unsuccessfully, to get rid of the enormous irrelevant collection of shells, minerals, and art objects which occupied the whole of the third floor gallery in the crowded main building; but legal obstructions prevented this.

He was young in spirit and always ready to consider new suggestions and new methods. And he was a great master-librarian.

Griffith Evans Hubbard

Evans Hubbard was elected to the Century in 1935. He died on July 23, 1950. He graduated from Harvard in 1914, and from the Harvard Law School in 1922. In the interim he fought in World War I, was mustered out as Captain in the Royal West Surrey Regiment in which he had enlisted, and he then spent some time in the Netherlands working for the Hoover Food Commission.

His interest in practising law was desultory. He tried it in New York; but in 1926 he and his wife bought a farm at Wilton, and there his heart was ever afterwards.

The Town interested him beyond measure. He founded and edited the newspaper, the Wilton Bulletin. He was Justice of the Peace, and Grand Juror, and Chairman of the Draft Board. He wrote a history of Wilton; and he served on almost every committee of the Town that functioned during the twenty-five years he lived there. The citizens often differed with him; but everybody had confidence in his integrity and motives. He came to be known as The Squire; and he took a personal responsibility in calling on newcomers and welcoming them to Wilton, in helping local business men to get started and keep going, and in shaping the remarkable development of the Town. The amount of trouble he took is quite unbelievable; but when he died the outpouring of friends who came to his funeral was a touching testimonial to the gratitude and affection in which he was held.

Charles Evans Hughes, Jr.

Charles E. Hughes, Jr. was elected to the Century in 1927. He died on January 21, 1950.

He graduated from Brown in 1909, and from the Harvard Law School in 1912. He was President of the Law Review. He came to New York and entered the law office of Byrne and Cutcheon; and, except during the First World War when he was a soldier, he practised law all the rest of his life.

In 1929 President Hoover appointed him Solicitor General, a position which he was admirably fitted to fill. His father was appointed Chief Justice in the following year, and so Hughes resigned and returned to New York.

He not only practised law most successfully, he was continually engaged in enterprises involving public service. He was a member of the Charter Commission which in 1936 framed the present City Charter. He was a member of the Committee which drew up the agenda for the Constitutional Convention of 1938. He was a fellow of Brown University, and a trustee of Teachers College, Columbia. In 1944 Mayor La Guardia appointed him as first chairman of the Mayor's Committee on Unity, in which capacity he worked to combat interracial problems and discrimination.

Hughes' support of the legislation known as the Fair Employment Practices Act incurred for him considerable criticism from his friends. But nobody ever accused him of being actuated by political ambition, of being insincere, or of being ignorant of the possibilities involved; and the working out of the law has not justified the opposition to it. The zeal with which he worked for an understanding among the city's varied groups was a shining phase in his life.

Among his friends he was held in extraordinary esteem. His outstanding attribute was his integrity. He always said what he honestly thought, and he did what he thought was right—without trimming, or hesitating, or obliquity of any kind. He never did a cheap or mean thing all his days.

He was a supremely competent lawyer, and he completely had the respect of the profession. He worked hard. He died, alas, too young.

Frederick Ellis Jackson

On February 9, 1950, F. Ellis Jackson died.

He was a nationally known architect who lived and worked in Providence. In that city a score of notable buildings certify to his professional excellence.

To his friends he was known as Pete Jackson; and he had a hearty, enveloping personality that made him attractive to all sorts and conditions of men.

He was elected to the Century in 1945; and in the short five years he was a member we saw all too little of him. The associations with him go far back to Beaux Arts days in Paris, when all the world was young and all the trees were green.

Thomas Jesse Jones

Thomas J. Jones was a Welshman. He was ordained as Presbyterian minister.

He early became interested in Negro Education, and he spent his life working in the field of race relations. For more than thirty years he was connected with the Phelps-Stokes Fund, and his more famous contributions to the solution of race problems were made under its aegis. When he retired in 1945 he was named director-emeritus of the Fund.

The achievements of Dr. Jones and his services to the cause of community education and race relations in America and Africa, are of the utmost importance and include a most astonishing variety of activities. Besides the Phelps-Stokes Fund, he worked, at different periods, for Hampton Institute, the Government Census Bureau and the United States Bureau of Education and the British Colonial Office.

He had a rare capacity for friendship, a buoyant attitude, and Christian faith in dealing with men and women of all creeds and races.

Edward Benjamin Krehbiel

Edward B. Krehbiel was elected to the Century in 1928, and died on June 16, 1950.

He was an historical scholar, and he studied and taught at the University of Chicago, at Stanford, at Columbia, and at Harvard. He carried on researches in Europe at the Public Record Office in London, and at the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris where he also attended courses at the École des Chartres and the Sorbonne. After having won an enviable position in the academic world as an historian, Mr. Krehbiel decided, at the age of forty-seven, to go into business.

To his friends this was a cause for astonishment; but he was exceedingly successful at it, and became general manager of the Gorham Company's stores. When he retired, some years ago, he lived in Ridgefield.

William Setchel Learned

Learned was a serious-minded, purposeful and devoted man. His dedication was to education—specifically, to improving the quality of the educational process. He believed that intelligent criticism of education on the part of its friends was a duty close to national welfare; that the pressing problem was to spread abroad the faith that education is truly a means of national salvation. Infused with such ideas, he was most at home with college and university presidents, with deans, with educational specialists. With them, throughout the United States and Canada, he was on friendly and confidential terms. In their company he found a satisfying outlet to think and to talk logically and at length.

When educational matters were laid aside, and in the privacy of his home, he turned to music; and in the piano found an outlet for an extraordinary skill. With him in his love of music his wife and daughter joined, all three being competent performers. Under such conditions Learned was another man, not a student and scholar in education, but an artist of taste and fine discrimination.

He was precise in speech and manner, always securing attention when he chose to speak. After he retired from active work with the Carnegie Foundation, he continued to devote himself to music, friends, and, of course, to education.

Not many months later, returning home from a dinner party one evening, he sat down and played selections on his piano for more than an hour. Before daylight, he had gone where good Centurions go.

John Salem Lockwood

John S. Lockwood was elected to the Century on June 1, 1950 and died on June 16, 1950. He was only forty-two years old.

The cutting off of this brilliant doctor when he was so young is truly a tragic calamity. He graduated from DePauw University in 1928 and from the Harvard Medical School in 1931. He received a Doctor of Medical Science degree in surgery from Columbia in 1938, after teaching there for a year. He was to have become director and chief of surgical services July 1 at Memorial Hospital for Cancer and Allied Diseases, having been appointed in March.

During World War II, Dr. Lockwood was a member of the committee on chemotherapeutic and other agents, and of the subcommittee on infected wounds and burns of the National Research Council. He was consultant to the Secretary of War, beginning in 1942, and was named chief of the division of surgery of the committee on medical research of the Office of Scientific Research and Development in 1944. He had written papers on the use of sulfa drugs and conducted an early study on sulfanilamide in 1938.

Not only was he a great scientific surgeon, but he was a man of character and integrity, interested in music and literature, and his children, and in the worthwhile things of life. His was an outgoing and outgiving spirit.

George de Forest Lord

George Lord was elected to the Century in 1944. He died February 2, 1950.

He was a lawyer. He practised largely in admiralty—in which field his father and grandfather were notable—and he became one of the brightest stars in that firmament.

It is difficult to think of anything about George Lord that could be much improved. He combined integrity of character with a gentle and sensitive temper to produce a charming and exceedingly competent person.

At an early age he acquired a considerable reputation as a teller of stories; and many a dinner-party has been enlivened by his yarns, such as the one about Bert's arrival in heaven where he sat on a cloud 'arpin with Saint Peter. Many of his favorite tales were in dialect, and he was a marvellous mimic. At Yale dinners he was invariably asked to impersonate President Hadley, a role which he played to the immense satisfaction of everyone. He enjoyed the outdoors, particularly his home at Syosset where he raised sheep and turkeys, improved the land, and rode horseback. Duck and quail shooting amused him, and an occasional fishing trip.

But, most of all, he enjoyed people. He was wonderfully good company, and to associate with him was a delight and an inspiration. He was completely free from hypocrisy or pompousness, and he filled important offices and discharged important duties with the same simplicity and whimsical humor that he played poker.

He was a good friend.

Richmond Mayo-Smith

Born at Easthampton, Long Island, on September 4, 1888, Richmond Mayo-Smith died in Dedham, Massachusetts, on October 7, 1950. Amongst his forebears were Governor Bradford of the Plymouth Colony and Noah Webster.

He graduated in 1909 from Amherst, and then studied for a year at the Harvard Law School. In 1910 he went to work for the Plimpton Press at Norwood, Massachusetts, as a printer's apprentice. In 1925 he became Treasurer of the Plimpton Press; and from 1942 until his death was its President.

He was a leading authority in the graphic arts industry, and his advice was often sought by book printers throughout the country.

During World War I, Mayo-Smith was a Lieutenant-Colonel in the A.E.F., and served with such outstanding ability as head of the Supply Division of the Gas Service, particularly in getting materiel to the front lines, that he was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal. As Major-General Amos A. Fries, Chief of the Gas Service, truly said, Colonel Mayo-Smith inspired every officer and man under him with "the punch of the firing line."

After his family, the great devotion of his life was to Amherst. An organizer, and later Chairman, of the Alumni Council and Society of Alumni, Mayo-Smith was in 1943 elected to the Board of Trustees of Amherst, and here, during the next six years, he served on practically every one of its important committees. In 1950 he was made a life member of the Board, and was thereafter chosen Chairman of the Board to succeed the late Alfred E. Stearns of the class of 1894.

Mayo-Smith's devotion to his Alma Mater was such that it often irked his fellow Centurions who were not Amherst men. After the Century dinners he would almost invariably disappear, and his friends who wished to talk with him would find him, usually in the Graham Room, surrounded by the Amherst Centurions discussing Amherst problems.

He was a master of the science of human behavior; and this in large measure explained not only his success in business, but also why he was sought after by Amherst and by other socially-minded societies. Few men could deal with problem personalities so happily as he. He could candidly express his opinions on controversial questions without irritating those who disagreed with him. He was gracious to all, so much so that on one occasion a pickpocket in the smoking room of a Pullman car found him so personable that the pickpocket returned a stolen watch before Mayo-Smith knew the watch had been taken. His integrity and fairness made him an ideal judge and trustee.

Edwin Godfrey Merrill

On January 16, 1950 Edwin G. Merrill died. He had been a member of the Century since 1928.

He was a banker. He was born in Bangor, Maine, and got his early training in the Merrill Trust Company there. He graduated from Harvard in 1895, magna cum laude, and in 1928 he received an LL.D. Honorary Degree from the University of Maine. This background accounted for his characteristically dry and delightful humor of the down-east variety.

Ned Merrill was a very charming person and a very wise banker. He had a long and varied banking experience in New York, and was much admired by his associates over the years. Underneath a quiet and unassuming personality, he was a man of great force coupled with a sweetness of disposition manifest in all his personal relations. His responsibilities were varied and numerous, and he discharged them to the great satisfaction of his associates.

Adolph Meyer

Adolph Meyer was elected to the Century in 1906. He died on March 17, 1950.

He was one of the most eminent psychiatrists of the time, and one of the great figures who brought world-wide honor and distinction to the Johns Hopkins Medical School. Although small in stature and kindly in manner, he had an intensity of conviction and a passion for facts which, in combination with his breadth of view, gave him great power of leadership among his associates. He worked out a pattern of case study in clinical psychiatry which became the accepted model for case records.

When he received an honorary degree from Yale in 1934 the citation referred to him as "the beloved physician of the ailing mind." At a testimonial dinner in 1937—when he was seventy—he was acclaimed as "a great humanist" and "the architect of the cathedral of psychiatry."

At Johns Hopkins he was once visited at the Phipps Institute by the Queen of Belgium. After waiting for some time to see Dr. Meyer, she recognized him at a distance, walked up to him, and introduced herself as the Queen. "Yes," replied Dr. Meyer; "How long have you been Queen? Many of my patients have had similar ideas."

Among psychiatrists he became a legendary figure—the idealized combination of immense erudition and practical common-sense. Among his friends the sadness at the termination of his life and work is tempered with pride in his achievements and gratitude for the experience of his friendship.

Frederick John Moses

Frederick J. Moses was elected to the Century in 1947. He died on January 22, 1950.

He was acustomed to spend only five weeks in the City, the rest of the year being in the Adirondacks and in Florida, where at the last he made his home. And so he was not a familiar figure in the Club.

He was an excellent trial lawyer, and a very successful one. In company he was humorous and kind. He labored for the good of others on every possible occasion, and added a salty urbanity to the circle he frequented. He was the perfect example of an "amateur," for he loved his fellowmen and all beauty and nature around him. He added to the happiness of everyone who ever met him.

A small, sensitive man, he had a sparkling intelligence and a background of extensive reading, which made him a lively and amusing companion. He was a loyal friend.

James Bumgardner Murphy

James B. Murphy was born in North Carolina, and graduated from the State University in 1905. After that he went to Johns Hopkins and took his medical degree. He spent the rest of his life in the North, in New York and in Maine; but he was always a Tar Heel at heart. He was wont to define Heaven: "Chapel Hill in Springtime."

Jim was an entirely civilized person. He was friendly and modest, and one forgot that he was one of the really great researchers in the long fight against cancer. He worked hard at this in the Rockefeller Institute, over by the East River, where he was in charge of the Cancer Research Laboratory. There, over the years, he developed ingenious techniques for studying the growth of tissue and tumor grafts, which became, in time, the key to potent inoculations dealing with yellow fever, typhus, influenza and kindred viruses.

He knew not only the medical fraternity but a most surprising variety of people. He smoked cigarettes incessantly, and he was prepared to converse on anything from lymphocytes to Sherman's march to the sea. He was wonderfully amiable, always interesting, and he brought to any discussion a kind of old-world courtesy which is sometimes found in Southerners and only too seldom in the North.

Francis Augustus Nelson

Francis Augustus Nelson was elected to the Century in 1923. He died on March 29, 1950.

He was an architect, and a very good one. He lived in Montclair; and the churches, residences and public buildings of that city are his work and his monument.

He graduated from the Columbia School of Architecture in 1900, and from the Beaux Arts in 1906. He taught design at Columbia for a time, and practiced architecture in New York till 1929, when he moved his office to Montclair. He was active to the end of his life—not only in his profession but in public service—and he was held in the highest regard in the Montclair community when he died.

George Harwood Olney

George H. Olney was elected to the Century in 1915. He died in 1950.

He graduated from Brown in 1895, and from the Harvard Law School in 1898. He practiced law in New York, and for a time he was the partner of Arthur Train. He was counsel for the Brooklyn Edison Company, and this was long his chief interest.

He was a well-educated man, with a first-class mind. His demeanor was grave and courteous. He was his own frame of reference and he did not make friends easily; and this, perhaps, accounts for his achievements appearing incommensurate with his high abilities. For ten years before his death he was completely incapacitated by illness, which he endured with the utmost fortitude.

Frank Copeland Page

Frank Page died in Washington on December 18, 1950. He had been living there for three or four years after he retired as Vice-President of International Telephone and Telegraph Co. One of his lungs got badly impaired in 1946 and he had to retire.

In Washington he became a sage. All sorts of people came and asked his advice. He had been up and down in the earth a great deal; and his advice was sophisticated and valuable.

Frank had no inhibitions beyond the demands of loyalty and complete honesty. It never occurred to him that possibly he was just not going to be able to do something that was suggested; and in consequence he performed feats that often astonished his intimate friends. Possunt quia posse videntur.

He was born in Brooklyn; but he was a tar heel at heart. The family came from North Carolina, and Frank went back there to work in the early days. He constantly managed to derive amusement from his work. He was always full of Washington gossip, and his comments were marvellously shrewd. Under a cloak of gay humor he concealed an exceedingly wise and efficient administrator.

He was delightful to talk with. His tenue was careless, and his eager interest was completely devoid of cant or posing. He was always just himself: colloquial, friendly, and understanding.

Walter Walker Palmer

Bill Palmer—as he was known—was elected to the Century in 1923. He died on October 28, 1950, at which time he was Vice-President of the Club.

He graduated from Amherst in 1905, and from the Harvard Medical School in 1910. He also held Doctor of Science degrees from Amherst, Columbia and Princeton. He was one of the first full-time professors of medicine in the country, and he taught in turn at Harvard, Johns Hopkins and Columbia.

He was a distinguished and competent member of the medical profession. He was constantly called upon to take responsibilities connected with the Army, or the formal organization of medicine, the licensing of practitioners, and such collateral but extremely important matters, and at these probblems he was supremely good. His researches on diabetes and nephritis and his contributions to medical journals were entirely out of the ordinary.

He died very suddenly at his farm in Tyringham. His heart stopped while he was raking leaves. The officers of the Club wrote to Mrs. Palmer:

"Bill was singularly well-appearing, happy and lovable all through the long Board of Management meeting last Wednesday evening. He contributed mightily to it by his excellent judgments and his delicate understanding.

"May you find some measure of comfort in thinking as we do of his strength and his gentleness, his proud record and his rare character. These things do not depart from us but abide."

> E'en as he trod that day to God so walked he from his birth,
> In simpleness and gentleness and honor and clean mirth.

Arthur Coxe Patterson

When the newspapers told us that Arthur Coxe Patterson had died there were some of his friends who did not know that it was Archie Patterson who had gone. For he was always Archie Patterson; and the love his friends bore him was such that they leaped lightly over the adaptation of his name, then almost forgot it as they came closer to a character that shone through all the ordinary labels of identification.

It was not that he lived a cloistered life. His name was well known in the law, which he practiced in New York for 47 years. A son of Justice Edward Patterson, of the Appellate Division of New York's Supreme Court, he carried on the tradition, quietly and capably. He knew history and government so well that his sturdy translation of the wisdom of the past into the need of the present carried a value that was unique.

This habit of study and instinct of patriotism showed especially in his hobby, which was the history of our Civil War. He knew the causes, the deep constitutional problems which underlay the years of sorrow which they were to breed. He knew the strategy, tactics and personalities of the conflict; and he knew every battlefield by heart, for he had visited them all, many times. There is always a legion of those who are fascinated by study of the Civil War, but there are few who have studied it as well.

He had a way of talking with you as though his interest in life lay in your thoughts, in your ups and downs, never in his own. There was a strain of merriment in it. During the long approach of his last illness the merriment persisted. It was more than courage, more than good conversation and happy association. There was some kind of light shining in Archie Patterson which made all the world better for sharing in it.

Ernest Poole

Ernest Poole will be remembered longest for his first novel, "The Harbor," although his second novel, "His Family," published a year later in 1916, had the distinction of being the first novel to win a Pulitzer prize. "The Harbor," a story of the glacier-like movement of industrialization over the commercial civilization that lingered up to the last decades of the Nineteenth Century, was really Ernest Poole's own spiritual record as well as an interpretation of the characters he created to explain the material changes in the world that could be seen so clearly from the heights of Brooklyn's small hills and less towering wharves. For all his life the privileged son of a well-to-do business man was in revolt against the new industrial civilization that brought him physical comfort but less satisfaction to the yearnings of his sensitive spirit.

Born January 23, 1880, he was not quite 70 when he died of pneumonia on January 10, 1950. He was elected to the Century in 1932. At Princeton, where he graduated in 1902, he was voted the "most useless man" in his class; but he lived to become one of those in whose achievements his classmates took the most pride.

As a young man he was the friend and associate of many of the memorable journalists and reformers of a generation now gone. Jacob Riis was one of his early heroes. He knew Lincoln Steffens, Ida M. Tarbell, S. S. McClure, Clarence Darrow, the Chicago lawyer whose persuasive tongue was such a source of anger and disappointment to many of the great pillars of the republic, and he personally aided Upton Sinclair in assembling the material that went into the writing of "The Jungle." At that period in his career Joseph Medill Patterson, later the founder of the New York Daily News, was also a Socialist and a boyhood friend of Ernest Poole. Both later gave up their Socialist inclinations; and yet both were undoubtedly influenced in maturity by memories of youthful faith in doctrines alien to their class and their upbringing. Ernest Poole surely by the wideness of his sympathy, the perception of his eye, and the eloquence of his pen, earned fairly the fame that came to him and the remembrance that lingers.

Alexander Phimister Proctor

Alexander Phimister Proctor was elected to the Century in 1901. He died September 4, 1950.

He was a sculptor and a big game hunter, and he became exceedingly expert in both fields. As a boy, he knew and followed about the streets such frontier notables as Buffalo Bill, Jim Baker and Arizona Bill. Undoubtedly these interests led him to devote his principal efforts to sculpturing animals. Among other things, he did the "Seven Mustangs" which stands on the campus of the University of Texas, the famous Princeton Tigers, the McKinley Lions at Buffalo, and "On the War Trail" in Denver.

He used to go away on hunting trips for months together. Then he would turn up again at the Century full of conversation and news—the best company imaginable. For a long time word went around in the studios that he did the horse General Sherman rides in the Plaza. Some Centurions charged him with this one day. He said no, he didn't do the large horse, from which the bronze was cast; he did the study on a much smaller scale from which the large model was taken.

He got around a great deal, and associated with all sorts and conditions of men, and at different periods of his long life he had different circles of intimates. Probably no one man knew him well his whole life through. He loved the out-doors, the men who lived out-doors, and the animals.

Robert Kilburn Root

Robert K. Root was Professor of English at Princeton University since 1916, and Dean of the Faculty since 1933, and he became Professor and Dean Emeritus on his retirement in 1946. His wisdom and administrative skill contributed greatly to the growth and national influence of Princeton, and have remained of enduring benefit to the policies and curriculum of the University.

He was internationally known as a scholar both in the field of Chaucer and in that of the eighteenth century, but he will also be remembered for many works which range from the scientific exactness of textual criticism, as shown in his edition of Troilus and Criseyde, to the philosophic insight and literary charm of such a book as The Political Career of Alexander Pope. He was also a graceful and penetrating essayist, as well as a co-editor of several widely used anthologies.

The recognized worth of his thought, the indelible impression it made on his hearers, the temperate and yet incisive quality of his judgment, made him supreme as an educator. A week before his death, he addressed a large group of Princeton undergraduates on The Personality of Samuel Johnson. The ovation at the end was so prolonged that it embarrassed, though doubtless it pleased him. He retained to the last his power to enlighten and to enthrall an audience. One of the finest tributes paid him as a teacher—and one which it would be hard to parallel—was that Root's Alumni Preceptorial, a group of his former students, now middle-aged men, has been meeting biannually at Princeton during the past twenty-five years in order to continue the study of English literature under his guidance.

Leonard Cutler Sanford

Dr. Sanford graduated from Yale in 1890 and from the Yale Medical School in 1893. He was for long a surgeon on the staff of the New Haven Hospital.

In 1919 he gave up medicine in favor of ornithology. He was enormously interested in birds, and always had been; and he not only knew about them, but he was a marvellously skilful taxidermist and could skin and mount a bird better than any but the most expert professionals. He had great strength and dexterity with his hands; his penmanship was exquisite; and the delicacy and precision of his manual operations were a delight to see.

He was a great collector, and he infected others with his enthusiasm. His contributions and those he procured others to make to the American Museum of Natural History are of the utmost scientific value.

Dr. Sanford was elected a Trustee of the Museum in 1921. For ten years before that he had missed no opportunity to enhance the importance of several of its departments by giving, or inducing others to give, rare birds, insects, mammals and other needed specimens. During nearly 30 years of his service as a Trustee, the Museum was always his greatest interest in life. No project was too large for him to contemplate, as he first showed in 1911 when he persuaded Mr. Frederick F. Brewster of New Haven to finance a great marine ornithological expedition around the entire coastline of South America. This work continued for five years, resulting in the acquisition of nearly 8,000 study skins of oceanic and littoral birds. Later Dr. Sanford interested Mr. Harry Payne Whitney, his wife and three children in the Museum, a fact responsible for the Whitney South Sea Expedition, which was the greatest piece of ornithological field work in history. Dr. Sanford's influence with the Whitney family led also to the acquisition of the Rothschild Collection of birds and to the entire wing of the Museum structure which houses the Department of Birds.

In 1948 one of the newest and most important of the Museum exhibits was dedicated as the "Leonard C. Sanford Hall of Biology of Birds."

Charles Brown Sears

Judge Sears died at his home in Buffalo on December 17, 1950. He had already passed the span of four score years, and had long typified in his profession all that was best at Yale University and the Harvard Law School. He was one of the few judges of his day who supplemented his college work with study at a German University, for he had attended lectures at the University of Berlin in 1892-93. At New Haven he was a member of Scroll and Keys and an editor of the Yale News. At Harvard he was an editor of the Law Review and graduated from the Law School cum laude.

His thorough education early bore fruit. After admission to the New York Bar in 1895 he began practice in Buffalo, and soon became one of its leading lawyers and citizens. There he became associated with the famous law firm best known as Rogers, Locke & Milburn. In 1937 he was appointed a Justice of the State Supreme Court, and thereafter became [successively] a member, and later the Presiding Justice, of the Appellate Division, Fourth Department, and finally a member of the New York Court of Appeals. In all these offices he was held in high esteem and universally regarded as one of the foremost judges of the State.

Sears was a delegate to the State Constitutional Conventions of 1915 and 1938, and in the latter Convention was Chairman of its Judiciary Committee. For many years he was a member of the New York State Judicial Council. Even after his retirement from the Bench he was chosen referee to report in the famous case of Harry Bridges; and later he acted as the Presiding Judge in some of the Nuremberg trials.

He approached every question with an open mind and rare intelligence, and both his outlook and reading were wide. In Buffalo he seemed to be all in all: President of the Fine Arts Academy, President of the Philharmonic Orchestra, President of the Community Fund, Vice-President of the University—indeed, in everything a trusted and disinterested leader.

Fortunate the city which has had Charles Sears and John Lord O'Brian, old friends and collaborators in every good work, as its first citizens. Fortunate the University that has been able to give the New York Bench such graduates as Judge Sears and Judge Thacher. Happy the friends who have come within the ambit of their influence. That both were Centurions shows the quality of our membership and its important contribution to every calling.

Taber Sears

Few artists have been moved as was Taber Sears to do so much for other artists.

Few have been so modest as he in claiming credit for fathering projects helpful to his profession. In reading through the minutes of a nation-wide art group which he served for years as an officer and for nearly twenty years as a member of its National Executive Committee, it was a revelation to find, time and again, some motion by Taber Sears discussed and not passed; but the seed of thought had been planted. A year or two later the same idea was advanced in but slightly changed words by another board member, passed, and put into effect with startling success, winning wide-spread regard for the Society. In no instance did Taber Sears remind his fellow board members that credit for this was due him. He was satisfied to get the matter done.

His strengths of body and mind and spirit are what we like to associate with the founders of New England. The Sears forebears early settled in Plymouth; the Tabers lived in Sandwich, and followed the sea.

In his profession he was well grounded in technical matters by study in Boston at the Art School of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, and in Paris in the atelier of Jean Paul-Laurens, at the Academie Julien. While in Paris he shared a studio high up above a court-yard off the rue Buonaparte with young Nelson Goodyear. Florence and Rome widened his horizon.

Back in America, now in New York, he began a notable series of religious paintings—murals and panels framed as altar pieces—that now are in churches from coast to coast. We have seen one of these, a triptych painted for Trinity Parish, New York, taken out of its frame and laid flat for cleaning. The perfection of its technique was memorable. The largest painting in the City Hall is the ceiling mural by Taber Sears in the Council Room.

In the days of John LaFarge, Edwin H. Blashfield and Kenyon Cox, Taber Sears served as an officer of the National Society of Mural Painters. He became a member of the Century in 1906, and in the days of the presidency of Elihu Root was a Trustee for a three year period. He was a painter-member of the Art Commission of the City of New York, and will long be remembered as an outstanding president and board member of the Municipal Art Society.

To associate with him was a delight. His thought was generous, and his mind well-stocked with facts by a wide and rich experience. The first person singular never intruded to turn the talk to ashes. His eyes were luminous, and in discourse he seemed to become effulgent. Such rare hours are cherished always. Alas, that physical limitations must bring them inevitably to an end.

Cecil Smith

Cecil Smith was elected to the Century in 1943. He died on October 23, 1950.

He was himself a first-class violinist, and to musicians he was a guide, philosopher and friend. There is some innate quality in musicians which seems to lead many of them into financial bogs and causes their affairs to become most astonishingly muddled.

Smith knew about this; and the number of musicians that he kept alive and outwardly solvent is legion. For he was a kind and exceedingly competent person; and when he was not engaged in discharging the onerous responsibilities of president of Yardley & Company, he devoted his attention to maintaining and furthering the standards of his avocation, music, and to helping its practitioners.

During the last year of his life he was president of the Edward MacDowell Association (the art colony at Peterboro founded by Mrs. MacDowell in memory of her husband).

He was elected president at a time when serious illness compelled Mrs. MacDowell to give up active direction of the colony. During the difficult period of adjustment when spirit and tradition had to be clarified and codified, his control over what to anyone else would have been a bewildering and chaotic congress of human elements was firm and sure; and he worked out difficult situations by the force of his own personality. He was patently honest and sincere, and men trusted him.

Joseph Lindon Smith

Joe Smith belonged to that small and happy category of painters and draughtsmen—the painter-archeologists. It may be that with his death this rare and peculiar species of artist becomes extinct; for to our hurried generation the representation of ancient art by camera is good enough for study, or if our interest is vivid we speed through the air overnight, and meet the crusty monuments face to face. But Joseph Lindon Smith, and Catherwood, and Piranesi achieved a grandeur and completeness of expression in their renderings of the beauties of the antique world, which escapes the camera and which mechanical devices cannot supersede.

Smith was a master draughtsman, and a master of surface rendering. His outline has an authority that none can question, and the time-worn surfaces are painted with such happy skill, that for the moment we are not sure if the image be real or simulated. More spectators than one have slyly touched the canvases to make certain of their substance. This so-called "cheating of the eye" is among the humbler skills in art, but it gives the spectator, whether artist or layman, the start of surprise and pleasure which the genuine work of art is supposed to induce. It is one of Smith's fine qualities that this uncanny reality is achieved, not by slavish copy of the stone or marble, but by deft selection of its important aspects, so that we see the image fresh, as we do looking at the original, before examining its every detail.

Smith was a world traveller, and his curiosity and the subject matter of his painting took him far afield: to Copan in the Maya country, to rosy Petra in Arabia, to Japan and to Ankor Wat; but his major work was done in Egypt, and upon it his reputation rests.

On his first trip to the Nile, Joe was at the rock temple of Abu Simbel above the first cataract. One afternoon he was finishing a study of the magnificent façade of the temple, when from a sand bank off to one side he saw a little old lady clambering up to where he sat. As she approached he heard her say, "Why, there's a painter." She seemed out of breath, fatigued, and Joe got up and offered her his camp chair. She asked his name and what he was painting, told him he was a very fortunate young man to be there, and asked if he had any more paintings. He said he had some down in his tent; and she said, "May I see them—now?" He showed them to her, and she asked if the pictures were for sale. He, thinking her just a crackpot, said, "Sure, there's a sucker born every minute." She said she would be the sucker and take them all.

She asked him to come to dinner on her boat and to bring his bill. No price had been mentioned, nor did she tell him her name. After dinner, the old lady asked for the bill and wrote out a check, which Joe took, but was too excited to examine; not till he got back to his tent did he find out the name of his first customer for Egyptian work: Mrs. Phoebe Hearst.

Later in Cairo, Mrs. Hearst bought more of Joe's pictures; and she invited him to meet, at dinner, a very distinguished American archaeologist who was excavating for her. This was Dr. George Reisner; and he, after seeing the pictures, decided that this young painter must continue to work in Egypt, and that all he accomplished in the future should go to the Boston Art Museum, where he, Reisner, was the curator of the Egyptian department.

Thus was Joe's happy destiny determined.

In the spring of 1950, Smith rounded out in Egypt fifty winters of happy and productive painting; painting commissioned by the Boston Museum and by patrons public and private. The last three years were full of fresh interest, for the Egyptian government, recognizing the value of his work, requested him to found a school in Cairo where Egyptian students might learn the Smith-technique of archeological painting.

To some, archeology is a drab and dusty business; but not to Joe Smith. He found in it a glorious and diverting life. He loved fun, and he made fun wherever he went, overlaying the profounder sides of his nature with a protective coloring of gay and waggish humor. Joe was a famous teller of stories, narratives so humorous in detail and action that it was an orgy of mirth to hear them, and which no rash imitator could reproduce. He was also an actor by nature, and a born producer of pageants, and had equal success in impersonating the clown in the local horse-show, in producing the "Agamemnon" at Harvard or in contriving a brilliant Tiffany ball.

Between the exciting winters on the sands of Egypt, Joe retired to the pines and coolness of Dublin Pond, New Hampshire. There he was the heart and life of a community of delightful friends and neighbors. To young and old in Dublin he was known as "Uncle Joe"; and three generations of all ages have thrilled at his stories, laughed at his pleasing antics, and acted in the half-impromptu plays he gave every summer in the open-air theatre on Loon Point. The plays were pageants crowded with beautiful young women and charming children, to whom actor-Joe was the fantastic comic relief.

Joe's personal appearance remained unchanged over the years, and age brought no impairment to his charm and energy. He seemed permanent and imperishable. The realization that he was mortal comes to us with consternation and profound regret.

Morris Kellogg Smith

Dr. Morris K. Smith went to Andover, and graduated from Dartmouth in 1907, and from the Dartmouth College of Medicine in 1911. He was a doctor all his life. In the First World War he served with the Black Watch Regiment of the British Army, and also as a commissioned officer in the United States Army Medical Corps. In the Second World War he was a Colonel in the Medical Corps, and was stationed in France and Germany for a long time. At the time of his death he was a Consulting Surgeon at St. Luke's Hospital.

He was devoted to his profession and to his country. The seriousness with which he labored in both causes is indicated in some measure by the recognition he received. The rewards bestowed upon him were not the adornments of a commonplace life, but were given for good reason. They do not go to those who become weary in the early morning hours, but to those who toil through the heat of the day and into the night.

Morris was a gentle soul; to such an extent, in fact, that he often did not discriminate between the deserving and those who might have been considered by the less sympathetic as undeserving. It happened, at least on one occasion, that a patient being treated in his office not only failed to pay him for the services rendered but ended by borrowing money from him. He was also easy prey to the fake veteran on the street corner selling bows of red, white and blue ribbon for the "boys." This confiding generosity was not due to a lack of understanding but was the outward manifestation of a kind heart which prompted him to let the rain fall upon the unjust as well as upon the just. He could neither act nor speak ill toward any man.

His life was, indeed, a fulfillment of the Golden Rule: he did unto others as he would that others should do unto him, and he loved his neighbor as himself. He bore the suffering of his final illness with the same stoical fortitude he had shown in every crisis of his life, and he has now gone to the reward that awaits a truly good man. We miss him very much.

William Freeman Snow

William F. Snow died in his 75th year on June 12th. He had gone "down east" early to his summer home near Bangor, and on that Monday morning went into town to do some shopping. He fell in the street. A physician who was looking out of his office window saw him fall and went to his aid, but Dr. Snow was already dead.

He was a physician, but he was never in active private practice. Yet it is almost certain that he prevented more illness, more suffering, and more sorrow than any single physician who lived in his generation—for he was the dynamo of the American Social Hygiene Association. He was its first director, when the Association was founded in 1913; and he remained active in its affairs until his death. Dr. Snow spent his entire professional life in prevention of the venereal diseases, particularly syphilis, and became generally recognized as the outstanding international leader in the field of syphilis prevention and control.

Charles W. Eliot once wrote: "I believe Dr. Snow to be the most effective man in the field of public health—not one of the most effective men."

His immense effectiveness lay in his quiet, self-effacing modesty, his dynamic energy, and his firm conviction of the vital importance of his work.

During World War I he realized that a true epidemic of syphilis had swept the nation, and he drove home the concept that venereal disease could be prevented, and was not an inevitable component of military life. As a result of this work he was given great responsibilities by the President and by the National Council for Defense. It was during this period that he developed his remarkable talents as an effective social strategist, and a molder of the opinions of men.

World War II came just as he was ready to retire from active work in Social Hygiene, but the next five years were the most productive and active of his whole life. It may be truly said that the direct result of his efforts was the marked diminution of venereal disease in the armed forces, as well as in the nation at large, during and following the War.

He was a public health statesman of great stature, known for his true worth by only a few; but in the final analysis the things that he accomplished are so enduring that they speak for themselves and are sufficient praise.

Fred Palmer Solley

Fred P. Solley was elected to the Century in 1927, and he died in 1950. He graduated from Yale in 1888, and from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1892. He served three years as an interne at St. Luke's Hospital. He was a member, from its founding, of "The Society of Internal Medicine," and through this he made important contributions to what proved to be the birth pangs of modern medicine. The members held teaching and hospital positions, and their influence on the younger members of the profession was profound.

Solley's appealing personality, his sympathy for and understanding of human frailties, the confidence he inspired in his patients, together with the fruits of his training and experience, complete the picture of a "Beloved Physician."

He was keenly alive to the inspiration of literature and the fine arts, but he did not resort to painting or sculpture, as do many of his colleagues seeking escape from their anxieties. His was the avocation of a scholar, and, in the words of his son: "His chief interests outside of medicine, during recent years, were genealogy and the history of areas to which his genealogical researches carried him. This included a very detailed knowledge of the development of Connecticut, New Jersey, Long Island and the adjacent portions of New York State from the time of their earliest settlement to the present."

There is a belief that modern man is cast in baser molds than his fathers and grandfathers. So long as cultured gentlemen of the intellectual and spiritual qualities of Fred Solley continue to exist, the stuff Centurions are made of shall not perish from the earth.

Henry Lewis Stimson

Henry L. Stimson came of pure New England stock, save for a dash of Huguenot blood through a great-grandmother, a Boudinot; but he was a true New Yorker, for his grandparents on both sides left Massachusetts and came to New York shortly after the Revolution. Three happy years in Andover at the Phillips Academy, four years in Yale and two in the Harvard Law School, he then came home to New York. Shortly after his admission to the Bar in 1891 he entered the office of Elihu Root as a law clerk, together with his lifelong friend and partner Bronson Winthrop. He enlisted as a private in the Spanish American War, and rose to the rank of Lieutenant. In the First World War he served at the front as Colonel in command of a regiment of field artillery.

He cast his first Presidential vote for Grover Cleveland in 1892. The revelations by the Lexow Committee of Tammany corruption led him to join the Republican Party.

In December, 1905, he was appointed by Theodore Roosevelt United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York. The President had come to know him in the Boone and Crockett Club of New York. They were both big game hunters; and it was said of Stimson that he was the only member who had stalked a grizzly alone. Stimson at once showed his executive ability. He gathered about him a staff of young lawyers, the pick of the best law offices in the City, and he completely reorganized the office. It was a period when the railroads and Big Business corporations were indulging in unlawful rebates, and Stimson prosecuted them with vigor and success as he did the American Sugar Refining Company in the 17 Holes case for customs frauds.

The only elective office for which he ever stood was the Governorship of New York in 1910. It was Theodore Roosevelt who persuaded him to accept the nomination. He was defeated by John A. Dix.

In 1911 he became Secretary of War under President Taft.

In 1927 by appointment of President Coolidge he went to Nicaragua, then engaged in a bitter civil war, put an end to the Revolution, brought about a fair election, and established a liberal Government. In 1928 he was Governor General of the Philippines.

From 1929 to 1933 he was Secretary of State under President Hoover.

In September, 1931, while Stimson was serving his last year as Secretary of State, the Japanese began their aggressions in South Manchuria in violation of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, the Nine Power Treaty, and the Covenant of the League of Nations. Stimson did everything within his power to persuade the other Nations and the League of Nations, of which the United States was not a member, to protest this flagrant breach of international obligation, and, if he could have gained the support of the British Foreign Office and the President, it might have prevented the Second World War, and its direful consequences.

When President Roosevelt telephoned to Stimson inviting him to become once more Secretary of War he was almost seventy-three years old, but he did not hesitate. The opposition of Republican Senators to his confirmation—which was not based on his qualifications, but on the ground that he was lending aid and comfort to their political enemies—came to naught. His statement before the Senate Committee was frank and clear. He did not sympathize with all of the President's domestic policies, but he entered the Cabinet completely free.

He selected his assistants without regard to Party. Robert P. Patterson and John J. McCloy and Robert Lovett became his chief assistants. The President told Stimson he counted on him to be a stabilizing influence in the Cabinet, and this he certainly was. His relations with Roosevelt were always of the friendliest, but he was forthright and firm. A story will illustrate his attitude. After a Cabinet meeting, the President asked several members their opinion on a problem he had to deal with. When he asked Stimson his opinion, Stimson said: "I have no opinion."

"Yes, but your off-hand opinion?"

"I have no off-hand opinion. Let me think it over, and I will give you my opinion tomorrow."

It was Stimson who first urged that the High Command should be given to an American; it was he who opposed successfully the plan to make Germany a rural country; it was he who assumed, or had thrust upon him, the responsibility for using the atomic bomb.

No statesman in our history has surpassed him in integrity and selfless devotion to his country, and no civilian in any country rendered greater service in the Second World War than Stimson, except Churchill and Roosevelt.

No picture of Stimson would be complete without reference to his wife, whom he married in 1883, and to whom he dedicated his memoirs in these words: "To M.W.S. whose love and care have made possible both the life and this account of it."

John Torrence Tate

Dr. John T. Tate lived in Minneapolis, where he had for many years been a member of the faculty of the University of Minnesota. He was probably the best loved of his generation of physicists. A highly competent scientist and an able teacher, he found his main expression in the direction of broad activities among his compeers rather than in research as such. The creation of the Institute of Physics was, for example, a characteristic endeavor into which he poured unstinting energy. Matters of this kind he handled in so broad-gauge a manner and with such geniality, that he not only became known to all the physicists in the country but was a friend to all who worked with him in any way. Controversies there are among the physicists, but there has never been any difference of opinion about Tate.

An old friend of Tate's writes: Jack was one of the most distinguished men on the University campus in appearance as well as otherwise. When he stood up before an audience in his academic attire with his cap removed showing his great mane of pure white hair, he was the personification of the kindly, earnest, dignified college dean at his best. But get him into old clothes with his favorite fishing hat, with its sweat-stained band, give him some greasy tools and an outboard motor to tinker with, he looked just as disreputable as anyone.

One beautiful summer morning at Lake Minnetonka after Jack had got the poor old outboard motor into running shape again, we put it on an equally old and decrepit row-boat and went out for a ride. As we came around the point of an island, there before us was a beautiful, gleaming, white and gold cabin cruiser. There seemed to be some trouble because the boat was not moving, and as we came closer, we saw a man standing on the deck motioning to us.

Jack swung our little boat over that way; and when he cut off the motor, the man in the cruiser called that he was out of gas and could we tow him to the boat works about a mile away. We recognized him as one of our local tycoons, and I was about to tell him that when we reached home we would phone the boat works to come after him, when Jack spoke up and said, "Throw us a line."

We towed the big boat all the way to the boat works with our little outboard chugging away, taking about an hour for the trip. After we had his boat tied up to the dock the owner said, "I am glad you men happened along," and handed Jack a half dollar. Jack took it, put it in his pocket, and we pushed off for home.

When we got there and Jack stopped the motor, I said, "What's the idea of taking that old Coot's half dollar?"

He said, "Well, if I hadn't, we would have ended up by introducing ourselves, and then he would have felt humiliated and apologetic; and this way, everybody is satisfied."

"All right," I said, "but it's my boat and motor and it was my gas, so give me the half dollar."

"Not on your life," said Jack. "In the first place, you wouldn't have towed him in; and in the second place, if he would have offered you the half dollar you would have told him to go to hell. It's mine, and I'm going to keep it,"—and he did.

Thomas Day Thacher

On November 12, 1950, Thomas D. Thacher died. He was a member of the Century for twenty-five years, and during that time he had served on many of the Committees and as Second Vice-President.

He was a lawyer. He was sometime United States District Judge, Solicitor General, Corporation Counsel, and Judge of the Court of Appeals. In all of these offices he served with distinction. But perhaps his greatest public service was as Chairman of the New York Charter Revision Commission in 1935. After the completion of the revised charter, Thacher was one of its most stalwart defenders in the battle to have it adopted by the voters.

He graduated from Yale in 1902; and when he died he had long been a Fellow of the Yale Corporation. Harvard, Yale, Columbia and New York University gave him honorary degrees. The Bar Association of the City of New York made him its President. Among lawyers and layman alike, he was not least but honored of them all.

Tom had a gift for friendship and an understanding of politics in its highest sense that made him one of the best respected and most valuable citizens in the great city. But he was more than a successful publicist and jurist. He was an entirely reliable man. When there were heads to be broke he was never afraid, and when there were defeats to be taken he was never wanting. He had a capacity to inspire confidence that was entirely out of this world. Men would follow him, confide in him, and work and fight for him in the happy and unquestioning assurance that they were doing right. And he never let them down.

He could get very angry, and flushed, and quiet. He probably compromised less with evil than almost anybody who gets things done. He was loyal to his friends and to his ideals and ever ready to do battle for them. Yet his forthright courage won respect and made him friends, even in the ranks of his opponents.

Frederick Ridgely Torrence

Ridgely Torrence was a playwright and editor and poet, who won the Shelley Memorial prize in 1941 and the award of the National Poetry Centre in 1942. His poems and plays will live after us as part of our culture, but his personality survives in our memories.

When all the world was much younger Torrence lived at the Judson Hotel in Washington Square with Lyman Beecher Stowe and Maude Elliot Howe and Edwin Arlington Robinson. It was a magic place, filled with associations and ghosts of bygone days when Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, Lloyd Osbourne, William Vaughn Moody, F. Hopkinson Smith and a host of others lived there and wrote and painted.

Stowe writes: "One night when Ridgely and I were at dinner at our 'literary table' he asked me if I would accompany him that night to a certain play. I answered: 'Yes, indeed, why not?' So after dinner we started across Washington Square toward the Sixth Avenue elevated. He seemed strangely quiet for a man of his rich and eloquent powers of conversation. Finally I inquired: 'Ridgely, what's the matter? You seem worried.' He replied: 'I'm worried as hell, because it has occurred to me that you might have thought I was inviting you and were expecting me to pay for your ticket.' 'Don't worry,' said I, 'that never occurred to me as even a remote possibility.' "

To be loved by many people coming from different walks of life has been the lot of only a few. Ridgely Torrence's plays, written for and about Negroes, published and produced in 1917, won him something not measurable in medals or dollars: the trust and love of the Negroes who welcomed him to their exclusive clubs here in Harlem where other whites could not trespass. Throughout his life he strove to interpret Negro life in America both in his poetry and in a biography of John Hope, as well as in his plays.

George Gray Ward

Dr. Ward was born in London; and when he was but a year old his father and mother brought him to St. Pierre, Miquelon, on the steamship "Great Eastern." His father worked for the French Atlantic Cable Company, and the general expectation was that when Ward grew up he would go to work there, too. But he became enormously interested in medicine, and in 1891 he took a medical degree on graduating from the Long Island College of Medicine. Later he studied at the University of Berlin, and in London and Paris, as a graduate student.

His field was obstetrics and gynecology, and he taught these subjects as Professor in Cornell Medical College. In 1918 he became Chief Surgeon of the Woman's Hospital, and he filled that post till 1938, when he was made Surgeon Emeritus. He was a first-class organizer and the excellent operation of the Hospital today is founded on his systematic records and audits.

He was a skilful and conscientious surgeon, particularly expert in the field of cancer. He introduced radium at the Woman's Hospital, and was the first to use blood transfusions for ward patients there.

Like every good teacher, Dr. Ward was a never-failing source of inspiration to medical students, while his patients knew him for his gentleness and kindness. He was a distinguished physician, and a modest and humble man.

Stanley Washburn

Stanley Washburn, diplomat, soldier, war correspondent, and knight errant, who saw much history made when history was in an age of rapid and sensational making, brought home to his fellow Centurions enlivening first-hand experiences and observations of stirring events the world over.

Legends developed about him. One credited him with having seen more than a hundred battles. But he himself limited the number to a hundred.

The son of United States Senator William Drew Washburn of Minnesota, he early chose journalism as the career which would best gratify his adventurous spirit. It was only three years after his graduation from Williams College, 1901, following an apprenticeship as a police reporter and market editor, that his paper assigned him to a news dispatch boat, the Faiwan, skirting the Japanese fleet's blockade of Port Arthur, in the Russo-Japanese War.

From the Faiwan he was transferred ashore to the Japanese Third Army, which was besieging Port Arthur. There he won a news "scoop" by the first public announcement of the fall of the great fortress. He covered the subsequent Russian political revolution, 1906, with another dispatch boat on the Black Sea, and also ashore. Then, in 1909, he was head of an exploring expedition in British Columbia.

World War I found him for twenty-six months as a privileged correspondent with the Russian Army. He had faith it would yet recover the strength and morale to avenge its defeats by the Germans. With this as his theme he came home to lecture and write at the request of the Russian Embassy in Washington, and our State and War Departments.

Upon our entry into World War I, he became military adviser on Russian affairs to Secretary of State, Robert Lansing. The mass desertion of the front by the Russian soldiers ended this service. Another, however, awaited him: the diplomatic mission under Elihu Root, in its efforts to stiffen and stabilize the revolutionary regime under Kerenski, which was overthrown by Lenin and Trotsky. With the Bolsheviks in control in Russia, Washburn served on the western front until 1918.

In 1932 he ran for Congress as a Republican in his home district of Lakewood, New Jersey, meeting defeat by a narrow margin in face of the Democratic tidal wave. Included in his reckoning that he had made a thousand speeches in forty-two states since 1917, were those in support of the common cause of Great Britain, France, and Russia during 1939-40. Just this side of retiring age, at 62, he was on the list of Centurions, as Lieutenant Colonel in military intelligence who served in World War II.

Thomas Whittemore

Thomas Whittemore was elected to the Century in 1928. He died on June 8, 1950. The loss caused by his death will be felt far outside the walls of the Century Club, and outside the United States and Europe.

As is well known, his greatest triumph was in Turkey. After some experience in archaeological work in Egypt, and after uncovering the hidden frescoes in two Coptic Monasteries near the Red Sea in 1913, he turned his attention to Istanbul.

How he, a foreigner, managed to win the confidence of President Kemal Ataturk, and to gain permission to be put in charge of Haghia Sophia is a cause for wonder. His fascinating and dominant personality must have been the answer.

President Kemal did well when he risked the future of these great masterpieces of the past to a relatively young and unknown American. Whittemore was more than equal to the task. He succeeded beyond belief.

For eighteen years he spent his winter months in raising money so that he might toil through the heat of the summer in Istanbul, uncovering the greatest mosaics in the world, which the Turks had had covered up with plaster and paint over a hundred years ago.

"Haghia Sophia was built between the years 532 and 537 A.D. by Justinian the First, and dedicated to the worship of the Divine Wisdom. It is the culmination of religious expression in architecture of Eastern Christendom. With the conquest of the city by the Turks in 1453, the Church was turned to the uses of the religion of Islam. In 1935 it was declared a museum."

These are the words of Whittemore in his preface to his recently published album with beautiful photographs entitled "Mosaics of Haghia Sophia at Istanbul—The Byzantine Institute."

Whittemore created the Byzantine Institute and was the Director—in fact, he was the Institute. He created a Byzantine Institute Library in Paris, the value and importance of which were great—so great that scholars came from all over Europe to make use of it.

The extent of Whittemore's acquaintance was extraordinary. Wherever he went, in every country, he seemed to make friends with the leading people. He had a large circle of friends and admirers in Boston, New York, Washington, and many cities scattered over the country as well as in Europe; and he kept in communication with them in a way that would have overwhelmed almost anyone else.

He was a unique person. He was a sort of sprite or spirit —his body slight and agile was but the home for his soul. His clear blue eyes penetrated. He was frugal, moderate, and fastidious.

Although he never wrote a poem, painted a picture, or sang a song—yet he was essentially in his mind, feelings and instincts a poet. He was like a wisp of mist or like a bird suddenly appearing for a moment and as suddenly disappearing.

Otto Carl Wierum

Otto C. Wierum, a member of the Century since 1921, attributed the prosperity of his spirit to an abiding faith in the goodness of his fellow men. Never tolerant of evil, he was ever tolerant of eccentricities which mark the human spirit. He possessed an urbanity which placed the dignity of right and kindness above commonplace considerations. A wise and fierce fighter for justice, he was also the advocate of humanity.

In 1891 Otto married Mary Briggs. The charm and faith exemplified in their quiet happy life of more than fifty years together gladdened his years and the hearts of all of us who knew their devotion. They had five children, and the joy of Otto's last years centered largely in the progress of his nine grandchildren and a great-grandchild.

He was in the Club a great deal—particularly after his wife died. He played chess with the chess-players, and he played cow-boy pool in the billiard-room. But mostly he talked; and on long summer evenings he would be found on the back porch conversing with that circle of philosophers—always ebbing, always being renewed—that gathers there in escape from the great city. The younger members idolized him. He was kind and warm and understanding. His coevals delighted in him, and sought him out, and bound him to them.

He was forever propounding curious questions which made one think. And when the discussion was joined, he was always the liberal, proposing solutions and courses of conduct that were somehow reminiscent of the Sermon on the Mount. He was rich in friends—far beyond what is vouchsafed to the rest of us; and it is pleasant to think that he was dependent on them as they were on him.

Wise, well-read, staunch in argument, faithful in all things, Otto once quietly remarked: "All that need be said about me is: 'He believed in God, in the life eternal and the goodness of his fellow men.' "

He was very perfect, gentle knight.

Willem Willeke

Among the many distinguished musicians who have been members of the Century, Willem Willeke was not least but honored of them all. He was born at The Hague, and as a boy, in his teens, wanted to become a physician—in fact, he studied medicine for a time at the University in Bonn and in Vienna. Even then he was a cellist of note. He knew Brahms and Grieg, and was invited by them to play the solo part in their sonatas; and so enthusiastic were the composers that, through the influence of Joachim, he was induced to take up music professionally. He was cello soloist in many orchestras on the continent and received decorations from crowned heads, including Queen Wilhelmina of Holland, King Albert of Belgium, King Oscar of Sweden and Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria.

Coming to America, where he eventually became an American citizen, he joined the New York Symphony. In 1907 he became a member of the Kneisel Quartet, and remained with the Quartet until it was disbanded ten years later. He also became a conductor, and led the Julliard Orchestra for some years. In 1917 Willeke founded the Elshuco Trio, which was regarded as one of the finest chamber music groups in the country.

Willeke joined the Century in 1928; and in the wintertime, when working in New York, he went every day to the Club where his refreshing stories and almost boyish manner endeared him to the jolly group that frequented the Billiard Room. Everyone enjoyed the hours there with Willem, and everyone felt happier for his company. He just made everybody glad.

Lewis Williams

Lewis Williams was elected to the Century in 1921. He died on May 22, 1950, at the age of seventy-three.

He graduated from Harvard in 1900. He went into business at first; but his primary interest was music, and he took a position on the staff of Yale under another Centurion, Horatio Parker. Subsequently he went to Miss Master's School as a teacher, and there he stayed the rest of his life.

He made appearances with chamber music groups, and members of the Century heard him on numerous occasions. He had a happy faculty for making and keeping friends.

Roger Henry Williams

Roger H. Williams, born in Ithaca, in 1874, played important roles as lawyer, banker, and civic leader through many years of a truly distinguished career. A Cornell graduate, he received degrees of M.A. from Yale and LL.B. and J.D. from New York University.

He began his business career at the turn of the century in the banking business in Ithaca. He moved to New York, and there had charge of the legal and corporation work of Halsey and Company. In 1914 he opened his own law offices. In 1919 he was appointed vice-president of the National Bank of Commerce, now the Guaranty Trust Company. He became a partner in the investment banking house of Estabrook and Company in 1922, and retained this connection for 27 years until his retirement in 1949.

Mr. Williams was at one time financial and legal adviser to the late Charles R. Crane, the manufacturer and diplomat. Through Mr. Crane's connection with Czechoslovakia as the first American Minister at Prague, Mr. Williams was designated to work with the late Jan Masaryk, first Premier of the Republic, in the capacity of educational adviser.

One of Mr. Williams's staunchest loyalties was to Cornell University. He was a son of a widely known Cornell professor of geology and spent his boyhood days in Ithaca. He graduated from Cornell in 1895, and later served for many years as a member of the University Board of Trustees. For some time he was chairman of the Board's Investment Committee. At the time of his death in 1950 he was a Trustee Emeritus, still regularly attending the Board's meetings.

Herbert Eustis Winlock

Herbert Winlock was elected to the Century in 1924, and died on January 26, 1950. In 1933 Yale conferred a Litt.D. on him, and at that time William Lyon Phelps read the citation:

"Director of the greatest museum in the United States, Dr. Winlock took his A.B. at Harvard in 1906, and since that time has been engaged in archaeological excavations, his special field being Egyptology, where he is a recognized scholar. He possesses the rare combination of an orderly scientific mind with esthetic discrimination; he represents both science and art; in addition, he has one quality that is not invariably found among artists: great executive ability. And all of his articles, reports and published works are salted with a humor as original as they are irresistible."

When America declared war in 1917 he volunteered at once, although he was over thirty years old, and went to the first Plattsburgh Camp. He was truly wonderful there: filled with common-sense, and patience and cheerfulness. He was commissioned a Major of Field Artillery and went to France with his regiment. When he got home again he went back to digging in Egypt.

He unearthed Queen Hatshepsut, the lady who had been the aunt, step-mother and mother-in-law to her successor, King Thutmose III, and was present at the opening of the tomb of Tutankh-Amen; and he made the Egyptian Department of the museum bloom like a green bay tree.

As a member of the Club he was marvellously good company. His remarks were pithy and often indiscreet. He had an original mind and a friendly disposition. He was so simple and direct it almost seemed there must be some mistake about the many honors he had received.

George Woolsey

George Woolsey died July 1, 1950, at the age of 89. For fifty-nine years he had been a Centurion. Son of Theodore Dwight Woolsey, president of Yale, it was natural that he should prepare for Yale at the Hopkins Grammar School—founded forty years before Yale, and long a preparatory school for New Haven boys. While at school, and later at college, he spent much of his spare time collecting and preparing ornithological specimens, now preserved at the Peabody Museum of Natural History. Perhaps the manual training thus acquired led him to choose surgery as his profession. In any case, with this in mind he took a post-graduate year in the Scientific School before entering the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

In 1885 he received his medical degree. His work at P. & S. won for him the Harson prize, which, after a year and a half on the house staff of Roosevelt Hospital, he used to help finance a trip of study abroad. His companion for part of this time was the Centurion, Dr. Samuel W. Lambert. They first went to Hamburg, and later took courses in Berlin, Vienna and Paris.

In 1892 he married Jean Ellenwood; and they started their married life at 117 East 36 Street, where they lived till 1949, when they moved to New Haven. Certainly Woolsey was no rolling stone, for he occupied the same town house, the same country house, and the same Adirondack Camp for fifty-five years or more. He remained active in his profession till the age of 75. During his long career of teaching and practice he published many articles for the medical journals and wrote his book, "Applied Surgical Anatomy." A former house surgeon working as his assistant at the Presbyterian Hospital recalls Dr. Woolsey's careful, unhurried operating. He believed in such investigation as the incision permitted.

As interne at Roosevelt Hospital in May, 1866, he assisted Dr. R. J. Hall in performing the first operation in the United States for the removal of the appendix. He was the first to use the now accepted technique for the hernia operation, and also one of the first to operate successfully for cancer. If he had a specialty, it was operating on the digestive tract.

The Century was a treasured part of his life. He was there continually, even after his eye-sight was very restricted. He did not hesitate to walk to the Club, day or night, and laughed at any suggestion that there was risk involved. An account of Woolsey's life would be incomplete if no mention were made of his church. He was always a regular attendant at the "Brick Church," even after the church moved uptown. For twenty-five years he served as a member of the Board of the American Bible Society.

His contemporaries at the Century will remember his ever ready humor and his full enjoyment of what life had to offer. He was modest almost to a fault. His tastes were simple and unexacting. Living well into an age of skepticism, he maintained a serenity and balance that heartened those who knew him, and gave them renewed faith in the ultimate triumph of common-sense and decency.

Theodore Jacob Abbott

Theodore Abbott graduated from Harvard in 1898, and from P. & S. at Columbia in 1900. He was a physician: competent and skilfull. For seventeen years he was visiting physician at Bellevue Hospital, a consultant to the Veterans Administration, and clinical professor of medicine at New York University for more than forty years.

He was not a mixer. He was a self-effacing man; but he had close friends who were devoted to him and in whose company he was a genial and smiling companion. He was completely devoid of cant or pomposity; and he combined an innate simplicity with Victorian virtue in a happy and charming conduct of life.

William DeWitt Andrus

Dr. Andrus was born in Saugerties, N.Y., the son of the Reverend Jonathan Cowles Andrus and Margaret DeWitt Andrus. He graduated from Oberlin College in 1916, and received his medical degree from Johns-Hopkins in 1921.

For the ten years after that he was actively engaged in teaching, research and clinical surgery at the Cincinnati General Hospital and Cincinnati University. Then he came to New York as Associate Professor of Surgery and Attending Surgeon at New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center when it was established at its present site. During World War II he was responsible for the surgical service at the hospital, and for a time he was Acting Director.

His field was surgery and surgical research, and he wrote important scientific papers on the physiology and surgery of the chest, heart and blood vessels. He contributed also to the literature on the sympathetic nervous system, the thyroid, and the gastro-intestinal tract.

Despite his busy scientific life, Bill Andrus found time for other interests. He was very fond of good music, and equally fond of good reading. He "loved the woods" and all that that implies. Interested as he was in his fellow man, he made warm friends among the natives of Vermont where he spent the summers on an island with his family and where, with the assistance of one of his old friends, a native carpenter, he and his children built portions of his summer home. The quaint philosophy, the humor and the rugged individuality of his neighbors appealed to Bill Andrus very much; for fundamentally he was made of the same stern stuff that, with a fine, well-trained mind and his tireless energy, had made possible a life of service to his fellow man rich in accomplishment.

Boris Alexander Bakhmeteff

Dr. Bakhmeteff was born in the Caucasian town of Tiflis —Stalin's home town—in 1880, and was educated in St. Petersburg as an engineer. When the Kerensky regime gained control in Russia in 1917, he was sent to Washington as Ambassador. He held this post in the face of the Lenin coup until 1922, when it became evident that the Bolshevik government would not be quickly overthrown; and then he came to New York and resumed the practise of his profession as a consulting engineer.

He was exceedingly popular, and deservedly so. He was honorable, reliable and discreet, and he was extraordinarily well-informed on political, philosophical and religious matters. In 1931 he was appointed to the faculty of engineering at Columbia; and in 1951 he was named honorary professor—the fourth man in the University's history to receive this distinction.

He constantly lunched at the Century, and he had many friends there with whom he kept pleasant company. President Butler invited him to become a member of a small luncheon group, which went under the name of "The Occasional Thinkers," and for many years Bakhmeteff was an assiduous attendant at these Saturday gatherings throughout the winter season.

In any civilized country he would have been recognized as entirely out of the ordinary. He made for himself a place in America, by the exercise of talents of the highest order, where he was gladly received by those who sit in the seats of power, and his influence during twenty years on the course of empire was exceeded by few native-born sons.

Harry Rudolf Baltz

Harry Baltz was born in Philadelphia in 1860, and graduated from Yale in 1882. He was elected to the Century in 1920. He says, of himself, after graduating from college: "I travelled abroad for a year and a half, spending three months in Paris, and four months in Rome, studying French, Italian and Spanish literature. On my return I entered the law office of Biddle and Ward in Philadelphia, and was admitted to the bar in 1886. Recurring conditions of eye-strain obliged me to give up my profession and go into business."

He was a manufacturer for some years; and then he retired and continued his language studies—particularly the study of Dante, where he was an authority. He was a member of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, and former secretary of the old Italy-America Society. He was interested in Italy, Italians and music, and was a constant traveller: indeed, he died on board ship bound for Florence.

He was alert and spry, and carried himself well. He was always faultlessly dressed, and he wore his mustache carefully pomaded and a goatee. He was ninety years old when he died, but he did not look over sixty.

Reynolds Beal

Reynolds Beal was elected to the Century in 1918. He was a native New Yorker—actually born in the City—but toward the end of his long life he went to live in Rockport, Massachusetts, where artists collect and associate happily with one another.

In the beginning, Beal took an engineering course at Cornell; but he did not like it and turned to art for his vocation.

His early training was under William M. Chase in New York, and later he studied in European galleries—particularly the Prado in Madrid. When he grew up, he had been around a great deal and was most excellent company: informed and tolerant and entirely civilized. He had a wonderfully good time and divided his interest in art and oils with boats, water colors, nature, and whatever was going on.

He was eighty-four when he died.

Stephen Bonsal

Stephen Bonsal was elected to the Century long, long ago: in 1895. He was thirty in that year, and even in those horse-and-buggy days that was an early age to join. When Whitelaw Reid died in 1902 he became the dean of American war correspondents.

He went to all the wars—all of them. He began with the war between Servia and Bulgaria in 1885 and after that whenever there was a war, there he would go. As a correspondent he had not only the advantage and perception to see the inside of events, but he held official positions where he could see the outside from the inside, which balanced his perspective. In our diplomatic service, 1893-97, he was Secretary of Legation, or Chargé d' Affaires, in Peking, Tokyo, and Madrid. The Far Eastern service gave him background for the Chino-Japanese War of 1895, for the coming Russo-Japanese War, 1904-05, and the Chinese Revolution. That in Madrid enabled him to know Spain before our war with her. In 1913-14, he held positions under our Governor-General of the Philippines, which familiarized him with the islands from Mindanao to Luzon. The second year of World War I, 1915, found him again in the role of a correspondent with Hindenburg's army in East Prussia.

Back in the United States, before our entry into World War I, President Wilson sent him on a special mission to Mexico. Next, 1916-17, he acted as adviser to the American-Mexican joint commission; next, as a Major and Lieutenant-Colonel assigned to studies in the War College; and next, 1918, with the A.E.F. in France. After the armistice he was a member of the Allied Commission under General Smuts to Austro-Hungary, and was sent on a special mission to Germany and Bohemia.

Attached to the Peace Conference, his knowledge of the peoples of central Europe and their languages was of more value to President Wilson than acting for him at times as interpreter. It held Bonsal in Europe for the forming of the Covenant and the organization of the League of Nations.

While he was living in Westchester, before World War I, his trips to town always brought him to the Century. Afterward, settled in an old house at Georgetown, the Metropolitan Club in Washington saw him frequently. On his trips to New York he would reappear at the Century again absorbing its atmosphere, and contributing to it. Or he might be seen at a nearby hotel where young writers gathered, listening to what they had to say.

When complimented on his extraordinary gift for languages, he would say pointedly, "I worked very hard at them."

Considering his career, his interest in personal publicity was unconventionally remote. He inclined to have you tell him, instead of his telling you. It was necessary to "discover" his potentialities when he sat next to you at the long table. When you did, he might mix some pepper with his sprinkle of salt, which helps to prevent conversation lapsing into a repetition of clichés.

Stephen Bonsal was a highly cultivated man. As a correspondent, he was much more than a news gatherer. He was a great and active reporter of what he called a "vanished world." His pioneering historical background is of value now when his country has a major role in the making of future world history.

Joseph P. Chamberlain

Joseph P. Chamberlain was elected to the Club in 1920 and he died in 1951. He was a lawyer; but his interests were all in public affairs and he spent but little time in private practice.

From 1923 until his retirement in 1950 he was a member of the faculty of political science at Columbia, and after 1927 he was a member of the faculty of law. He saw plainly that statutes were an essential complement to the development of the common law, and he devoted himself and a large part of his patrimony to the development of proper drafting and interpretation of legislation. Apparently at the beginning of the century legislators drafted their own bills or they were drafted by interested and not very literate citizens, and the unorganized mass of unintelligible gibberish which got into the statute-books was incredible.

He became director of the Legislative Drafting Research Fund of Columbia. This functioned as a laboratory and training base in matters of legislation and constitutional law and rendered exceedingly valuable services to government agencies and to private enterprises. Here he trained young lawyers to learn the business of drafting, and some of these were sent to Washington to help Congressmen as volunteers. They achieved great success and won the confidence of the members of Congress, and some of them later became Legislative Counsel for the House, and others Legislative Counsel for the Senate, which offices were eventually made permanent. The offices still continue and present a singularly expert and non-political island of technical competence, drafting legislation expertly for the chairmen of committees.

Chamberlain was a very humble, modest, unassuming man. He was well endowed, but he took a stealthy pleasure in riding on the subways and eating in Childs restaurants and being very generous in helping individuals and causes that he was interested in. He was wise, not sloppy, in his good deeds. His talents were of a very high order, and the city and the government are the fortunate beneficiaries of his intelligent labors.

Ralph Hamilton Chambers

Ralph Chambers graduated from Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in 1893. He was an expert mathematician, and he approached engineering problems with an originality and technical correctness which marked him as one of the great engineers of his time. One of his interesting jobs was designing the caissons which were added to the foundations of Trinity Church in 1935. It had been discovered that the church spire was leaning five inches a year toward Wall Street, and was in danger of falling into Broadway because of the inadequate foundation put in when the tower was built in 1836.

While Latvia was still Latvia he worked out a hydro-electro plan for the Dvina River at the invitation of the President, and was in Riga for many weeks. Not being able to make fast progress with plans, he had a drawing board set up in his hotel room. It seems when an engineer over there makes his own drawings he loses caste, and he did—such work is for assistants. Nevertheless, he made his own drawings and got the job done. Despite the fact that he was working in Riga, at the request of the President, for the Government, his office was searched every night. When he mentioned the matter to the President, the latter just smiled. Chambers remarked that the chronic suspiciousness of the peasant mentality involved a good deal of lost motion.

His professional headquarters were in New York, where he designed the foundations of many of the tallest buildings. He knew all about the City and the people in it. He was not only a superb technician, but he loved his work and it expressed perfectly for him the hopes and fears that we all harbor.

Henry Asbury Christian

Dr. Christian graduated from Randolph-Macon College in 1895, took his medical degree from Johns-Hopkins in 1900 and his A.M. at Harvard in 1903. He started his doctor's calling as assistant pathologist at Boston City Hospital; but in 1908 President Eliot made him a full professor and Dean of the Harvard Medical School. He was known as the "Boy Dean."

He was Dean only until he got the Medical School out of the doldrums it was in at that time; but he continued a member of the faculty till 1939. From 1910 to 1939 he was Surgeon-in-Chief of the Peter Brigham Hospital. As a teacher of medicine he was steeped in the Osler-tradition and was himself a most vivid and exciting lecturer. He could be forthright without creating resistance, and he was immensely popular with both students and doctors. He seemed possessed of a daemon who drove him to give advice unsought, help unsolicited, and constant encouragement to those who faltered. He had a vitality which made him charming and a source of inspiration.

And he was a wonderful doctor.

Frederick Sharer Crofts

Crofts graduated from Cornell in 1905, and thereupon went into the book trade with the Century Company. He became manager of the firm's educational department in 1910, and that oriented his future career. His specialty was the publishing of college texts, and he brought to this an interest and talent that literally revolutionized the teaching of modern languages. In 1924 he started his own firm, and he placed the imprint of his personality on a list which marked a new era in text-book publishing. Eventually he became the moving spirit of the great Appleton-Century-Crofts enterprise.

Freddie knew all the publishers, and was not least but honored of them all. He was a director of the Cornell University Press, and his advice and aid were continually sought by teachers and professors and writers. He was always pleasantly supplied with trade gossip and blessed with excellent common-sense.

John Walter Cross

John Cross graduated from Yale in 1900 and from the Beaux Arts in Paris in 1907. He was an architect, and exceedingly competent at it. Many of the most important buildings in the City are his work including the Barclay Hotel, The City-Bank Farmers Trust Company and the General Electric Building. He also planned the R.C.A. Building in Rockefeller Centre, of which he remarked that the design of its entrance hall "strikes out into the future as far as the imagination can penetrate."

Cross was an aristocratic person, reserved, unhurried, courteous and very friendly and pleasant. His hair and moustache were red, he had a large frame, and he moved with an innate grace and dignity. He was never particularly active in architectural societies, but by appointment of President Coolidge he served a term on the National Commission of Fine Arts, and in 1947 he was elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

He worked hard and steadily and the City is studded with monuments to his energy and talents.

Edmund Ezra Day

Ezra Day was elected to the Century in 1947, the fourth President of Cornell University to be a member following Andrew Dickson White, Jacob Gould Schurman, and Livingston Farrand. Mr. Day became Cornell's fifth President in 1937, following distinguished service as an educator, first as a member of Dartmouth's Faculty and subsequently as Professor of Economics at Harvard, as Professor and as first Dean of the School of Business Administration at the University of Michigan, and then as an executive officer with the Laura Spellman Rockefeller Foundation.

When Ezra Day (Rufus Day to his intimates) became President of Cornell it was in the latter years of the depression, and he conducted the University's affairs throughout the War and the immediate post-war years. His hand was steady, and he maintained its high tradition as a free and liberal institution of higher learning. Under his leadership Cornell experienced its period of greatest growth; despite pressure from both within and without he kept Cornell in tune with the changing times.

Dr. Day was sure that one of the most important responsibilities of higher education was to protect the American way of life; to do so he firmly believed that we must give continuing thought to specific ways and means of defense against attacks made upon our freedoms. And among the things which he believed we must do is "to promote beauty as an essential element of wise living." Here was an economist, a worker in the social sciences, who vigorously promoted the Fine Arts as an important factor in a general education.

A distinguished member of Cornell's Faculty, at a dinner honoring Dr. Day at the time of his retirement spoke, in part, these words:

> "There emerges a picture of the man with whom we have lived and worked for a dozen years—a very human, warm-hearted man, quite without any side or pomposity, and with a keen sense of humor—a man with whom you can disagree without fear of losing his respect or friendship—a man at all times generous and fair, but a man who can decide with wisdom and insight which are the causes in which one ought to be tough. It is, I think, a good thing to say these things out loud, so that he can hear them, and so we ourselves may be reminded of our great good fortune in working under his leadership."

Herbert Dittler

Herbert Dittler was born in Atlanta. He was a musician. He taught music and he played the violin.

When he was young he was fortunate enough to study in Brussels under the great Eugene Ysaye, and here he developed the sure and sensitive technique which characterized his violin playing. He made his debut as a violinist in Berlin when he was eighteen; and after that he toured Germany for several years.

Dittler joined the Columbia faculty in 1919 as a violin instructor, later becoming Associate Professor, and he devoted the best years of his life to developing the Columbia University orchestra, of which he was conductor. His patience and insight brought this orchestra to a quite incredible degree of excellence—a tribute to Dittler in these days when college students are over-busy and anything but cloistered.

When he could get down to the Club from Columbia he liked best to sit at the long table following, with a twinkle in his eye, the disparate cross-currents of argument and conversation which there are never still. What he contributed himself was always worth hearing, and well and wisely put with the disarming hesitation of a shy and sensitive man.

He was only sixty-one when he died: lamented by his students, affectionately remembered by his friends.

Frank Vincent DuMond, Jr.

Frank DuMond painted portraits and landscapes, and for sixty years he taught at the Art Students League. He was the best known and best loved art teacher in the country. He, himself, had studied in Paris under Boulanger, Lefetre and Constant, but he brought to his pupils far more than skills and technique. He gave them a mature philosophy and understanding that kept his classes crowded year after year. He used to say: "We are all in a strange forest; and because I've been here longer, I am to guide you part of the way. Reaching that, I will tell you what I think is ahead. From there, it is yours to go on."

Fame came to many of his pupils, and he delighted in their success. He taught new ambitious youngsters as tirelessly as he had labored over those whose names are now great in the world of painting. Tall, energetic, possessing the artist's undefeated youth, he would climb four flights of stairs to his studio as easily as he did the green hills of Vermont where he taught his summer classes at Pownal.

His life was long and happy and filled with affection and friends. Students came to him to learn to paint, and he taught them the art of living.

Theodore Dunham

Theodore Dunham entered Harvard in 1881 from the Columbia Grammar School [he says] "under the tutorship of Charles C. Burlingham." He graduated in 1885, magna cum laude, and from the Harvard Medical School in 1888.

From there he entered Bellevue Hospital as an interne and passed through all the grades of the House Staff. He studied for a year in Vienna. Returning to New York, he was affiliated with the New York Post Graduate Medical School and Hospital; and, later, he was for twenty-five years Professor of Surgery there. He was exceedingly ingenious in inventing methods and instruments for difficult operations.

He spent the summers at Northeast Harbor, and went about Mt. Desert in a huge antiquated Packard making professional visits. He said of himself: "I have a passion for manual labor, both at the various mechanical trades and in agriculture, and I fully indulge this passion during the summer, with great benefit to mind, body and soul."

He was a fixture at Northeast Harbor: one of the oldest inhabitants, known to everybody, kind to everybody, universally liked and respected.

Thomas Harlan Ellett

Tom Ellett was elected to the Century in 1926. He was an architect—the architects' architect. He only had a little office, but the architects of the City beat a path to his door. It is a matter for wonder that ignorant clients should have employed him, for he was entirely uncompromising when the employer's untutored self-expression outraged his own aesthetic convictions. But fortunately not all merchant princes are so foolish as to interfere with a first-class artist.

An artist is just what Ellett was. He had marvellous artistic integrity, and he insisted on his way even though the employment were jeopardized. His taste was fresh and sensitive, and his work was finished to the last detail. No item was too small for his entire attention, no problem was unimportant. His sense of selection was powered by sympathy and feeling, and in his work he drove himself with restless discontent at anything short of perfection. All of his detail was his own personal handwriting.

In the City, perhaps Ellett's best known work is the Cosmopolitan Club. It is a triumph of planning. The most confining site restrictions did not preclude a singularly agreeable sequence of halls and rooms and terraces, and the whole is contrived with the utmost charm and grace. Throughout, the quality of originality is everywhere in evidence—as though the building had a glow permeating it and certifying the work of a master hand and spirit.

Like all sensitive men, Tom was driven into the wilderness every little while and required solitude. But mostly he was a delightful companion: gay, sympathetic, and generous in thought and deed. He was intensely loyal to his friends; and they, in turn, were irrationally and eternally devoted to him.

Lincoln Ellsworth

Ellsworth's father planned that Lincoln should go into the family coal business, and accordingly sent him to Yale's Sheffield Scientific School and the Columbia School of Mines. But Ellsworth harbored powerful urges to go to unknown lands where no man had gone before and to solve the enigmas of geographic science which lie on the frontiers of knowledge. This innate drive took him to the wilds of Canada, to the crags of the Andes, to the South Polar regions, and to the Northern Arctic. He always managed eventually to get back safe and sound—though his father died thinking him lost in the Arctic.

He was one of the great explorers of the time. After World War I he went on several minor explorations, but his first big one was for Johns-Hopkins University in 1924. The purpose was to make a geological survey across the Andes from the Pacific to the headwaters of the Amazon through Peru.

Back in New York, he and Roald Amundsen planned a flight to the North Pole. Ellsworth got his father to sponsor this enterprise, and on May 21, 1925, two planes took off from Spitzbergen and headed due north. They had a very bad time, ran into storms, were compelled to land short of the pole, and finally abandoned one of the planes. With great difficulty, they got the other plane into the air and made their way to a point in the open sea a mile off North Cape, where a sealing vessel found them.

Amundsen and Ellsworth tried again the next year, but Admiral Byrd had beaten them to the pole by three days.

In 1931 he attempted with Captain Sir Hubert Wilkins, the English explorer, to survey the underwater areas of the North Pole in a submarine, but they could not make the craft operate properly. He made several exploration trips by plane to the Antarctic, however, in the course of which he laid claim to 300,000 square miles of new land on behalf of the United States.

He was a gay and gallant person, always optimistic but never foolish. His preparations were always carefully made and the fact that he always succeeded in returning, where so many other explorers failed, is a testimonial to his competence and care. To associate with him was like opening the window to fresh air: he was not in the least interested in the housekeeping troubles of civilization, but he lived in a world where man seems closer to God.

Harold Perry Erskine

Hal Erskine was elected to the Century in 1923, and from the very beginning he was a perfect member. He was friendly and amiable and he was in the Club a great deal. In the summer he was to be found on the back porch, and in the winter he was down in the billiard-room. Wherever he was, he was always welcome, and everybody was glad he was there.

Hal was a sculptor; and the City is enriched with his work. Perhaps his best-known piece is the decorative panel at the entrance of the Dry Dock Savings Institute at Lexington Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street. The beauty and imagination in this great mural are indexes of the inner springs of inspiration which flowed in Erskine. Beneath a hearty, bluff exterior he harbored a vision of what is true and lovely and of good repute.

He was wonderfully dependent on his friends—as they were on him—and in the last years he lived across the street at the Columbia Club so he could be near to the Century. Toward the end he grew silent. He liked to listen to the chatter around him. As his energies failed he drew strength and comfort from the presence of men who were fond of him. He faded slowly from the circle. And then one day everyone was sad—but not sorry. For he had been ready a long time.

John Erskine

John Erskine was a teacher of English at Columbia from 1909 to 1937. He was a center of ferment, and those who studied under him had an exciting experience.

In 1925 he wrote "The Private Life of Helen of Troy." This novel placed him in the front rank of writers about the revolt of youth. Its success was enormous. It released Erskine from the financial limitations of a professor's salary; but it also seemed to release him from any strait provinciality ordinarily associated with school-teachers. He blossomed beyond belief.

He was an entirely astonishing teacher; he wrote the novel of the year; it was now realized that he was a pianist of the first rank. He became president of the Juilliard School of Music. Columbia conferred an LL.D. degree on him and so did the University of Bordeaux in France.

Like a juggler, he continued to keep his three plates, teaching, writing and music, in the air. He wrote more novels. He taught more students. He played here, there and everywhere. He was a truly wonderful show; and he never let his friends down. When he was cast to be the lion, he roared most agreeably and without a lot of silly urging. He knew everybody—Paderewski, Schelling, Siloti. He was a member of the Board of the Metropolitan—and a Vestryman of Trinity Church.

He was gay and witty and urbane. He was the best company in the town, and he had more fun than is ordinarily vouchsafed to four mortals. His friends were devoted to him. In an inexplicable way he combined a hard head for facts and figures with a romantic vision of the possibilities of things. In connection with the Opera, for instance, his judgment about salaries, underwritings and costs of scenery was as sound as his opinion about music.

He was like Leonardo da Vinci.

Robert Joseph Flaherty

Robert J. Flaherty was a member of the Century only a year before he died, and so the most of us never got to know him. He was the Father of documentary films; and his permanent influence on motion-pictures is second only to that of Chaplin.

He used his camera and celluloid as a painter his brush and a sculptor his clay. For that reason alone his films live to-day as vitally as when they were shot. Nearly thirty years after it was made "Nanook of the North" was billed in Piccadilly Circus in neon letters twelve feet tall. He observed slowly and patiently at first hand, and then bent his camera to interpret with love and honesty. He said, of his method: "I try to make my films a revelation of a country and of the people who live in it."

Flaherty worked at this practically all his life and came to be held in high honor by the industry. Considering his outstanding importance it is remarkable how few pictures he actually made. He knew all the explorers and travellers as well as the film-makers. Everyone liked him. He was gentle but persistent, modest but lavish with praise for others. His integrity of purpose, his blank refusal to compromise commercially, his deep understanding and respect for his medium—these qualities, so rare in cinema, set him apart as one having authority.

Christian Gauss

Christian Gauss graduated from the University of Michigan in 1898. In 1905 he went to Princeton, one of the youngest men in the Woodrow Wilson group, and at thirty-five he was head of the romance language department. In 1925 he was made Dean of Princeton, and he served as that till 1945, when he retired.

He was one of the great "preceptors," and his influence on the undergraduates was tremendous. He had the confidence of both the students and the faculty. He was interested in everything from foot-ball to nationalism, and he was wonderfully courageous in expressing his views about controversial methods of making peace, about prohibition, about isolationism, and academic freedom. He was a thorough liberal, and an outspoken one, even when it involved unpleasantness which it often does.

He was a small man, physically, with an alert and provoking mind and a vast fund of common-sense. His services to Princeton are beyond reckoning. As a companion he was lively and amusing and exceedingly well-informed, and one tended to forget that he was a very considerable scholar. As the chief disciplinarian of Princeton, he was severe and understanding. When he was wrong he calmly changed his mind; but he was usually right.

Clifford Mallet-Prevost Grayson

Clifford Grayson was a member of the Club for forty-five years. He was born in Philadelphia and studied painting at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts and at the Ecoles des Beaux Arts in Paris. He also studied with Gerome and Bonnat while in France.

He was a first-class painter. He won the Temple Gold Medal and in 1886 a $2,000 prize from the American Art Gallery in New York. Some of his paintings now hang in the Corcoran Gallery in Washington, in the Art Institute in Chicago and in the Art Club in Philadelphia.

He lived in a lovely old house, Cliffwood, at Old Lyme, Connecticut, and there he died at the age of ninety-four. In the later years he came to the Century but seldom. He had an aura of gentleness and peace.

Hayden Bartlett Harris

Hayden B. Harris's father was the founder of the Harris Trust and Savings Bank, of Chicago. This was a profitable enterprise, and it produced an income for Harris which relieved him of having to take any thought for the morrow. During World War I he quit the Bank, of which he was vice-president, and went to Europe where he served as an official of the Treasury Department—mostly in Russia—for several years.

He was a lover of animals; and he became Director of the Chicago Zoo. In this employment he was happy and exceedingly competent; and if the Zoo in Chicago is any good it is largely due to Harris.

He was interested in early American art; and he bought and gave to various galleries paintings done by artists of the Hudson River School, Copley, Sully, and others. A little while before his death he arranged to have published monthly by the Chicago University Press an American Edition of the oldest periodical in Europe, "The Swiss Review of World Affairs."

He was pleasant, comfortable company. He helped a lot of unfortunates in a stealthy, anonymous way—mostly undeserving ones that he knew and liked.

Hamilton Holt

Hamilton Holt was elected to the Century in 1904, ten years after he graduated from Yale. At that time he was a journalist, and he was managing editor, editor and owner, and then consulting editor of "The Independent," a magazine of public opinion. The diversity of his interests was astonishing. They ranged from every kind of activity of the Congregational Church to simplified spelling, social ethics, world peace, Democratic politics, Polish freedom, and the League of Nations.

It was in the field of education, however, that Holt achieved his most spectacular recognition. In 1925 he became President of Rollins College, at Winter Park, Florida, and then and there he undertook to "humanize" education. He had two-hour conferences instead of lectures; and in order to "break down the barrier between student and instructor" he abolished formal examinations. Arm-chairs and open air replaced the conventional hard benches and classrooms. The reason these innovations worked is found in Holt's own dynamic personality. He controlled the whole show—even to having the employment of professors depend in each instance on an undergraduate plebiscite—but after he retired in 1949 difficulties multiplied like mushrooms.

Holt was a striking man physically, and quick to make friends. He had many of the attributes of Alcibiades; and he was filled with energy and confidence and a high order of talent. He came of Connecticut Yankee stock, and was immune alike from fear or favor. When he espoused a cause, it became a crusade and he expected all good men to rally to his support: which again and again they did.

In conversation he was animated, polite and provocative. He was not always right; but he was always good company, always examining anew the accepted dogmas. He was perfectly fitted to be President of Rollins College, and he must have been grateful to the Divinity which shaped him to that end.

Joseph Gardner Hopkins

Gardner Hopkins graduated from Columbia in 1902, and took his medical degree at Johns Hopkins in 1907. He started work as a bacteriologist, and he became eventually the leading authority of the country in the field of dermatology. He was head of the department of dermatology at P. & S. (Columbia) from 1926 to 1947, when he retired. He remarked once that skin ailments were a wonderful field for a doctor, for the patients never died and never got well.

During the First World War he served as a Captain in the Medical Corps. During the Second World War he was civilian consultant to the Surgeon General of the Army, and was cited by General MacArthur for services in the Pacific theatre.

He was a pioneer in fungus diseases—such as athlete's foot—and practically all the specialists in this field were trained in his laboratory at Columbia. A patient once asked him how long he would have to continue to apply a remedy. Hopkins appeared to consider the question carefully for a full minute. "Well," he said, "keep on for about four years; but if it comes back again, you'll have to go on longer."

A young lady wished him to remove some blemishes on her back. Hoppy examined them gravely with a huge magnifying glass. "I couldn't take these off," he said. "They're below the décolletage line."

She argued with him. It appeared he was mistaken about the line. He took them off.

He was a homely man, wise and understanding, with a New England trick of understatement. His office in Seventy-eighth Street was a Mecca for a truly astounding variety of pilgrims; and he was exactly the same to each—irrespective of race, riches or social status. Foolish women thought he was a beauty doctor; and foolish men thought he was a cancer specialist. Children came covered with eczema, and he found their allergy and cured them.

Of course he could not cure everybody. But nobody went to consult him that was not benefited, and encouraged, and stopped feeling sorry for themselves. He seemed to exude morale, and it was a privilege to associate with him. It was also exceedingly pleasant and amusing.

He was an entirely first-class man.

Ernest Hutcheson

Ernest Hutcheson was probably the premier pianist of America. He had been playing the instrument so long that he often said he could not recall when he began. He remarked that he had "the happiest recollection of playing the piano when I was three."

He was equally celebrated as a teacher, and headed the piano department at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore from 1900 to 1912. He became Dean of the Juilliard Graduate School in 1927, and in 1937 he was elected President of the Juilliard School of Music. As President his contribution as a wise and sagacious administrator is outstanding; and the public, always prone to put a man in a pigeon hole, thinks of him in this capacity rather than of his extraordinary ability as a performer and interpretative artist.

His technique was ample and easy; and the effect of complete naturalness and lack of conventional virtuoso approach remained with him through all the years. Although as a child he had been an "infant prodigy" he was completely devoid of affectation or exhibitionism. His playing was characterized by a buoyancy and rhythmic vitality that "made the inner parts audible."

He was a defender of American music and musicians, and once said he pitied the man who "couldn't enjoy good jazz or Gilbert and Sullivan for what they are worth." But his heart was with Bach and Mozart and Beethoven, and under his hand their music lived and breathed and spoke to those who listened.

Ernest Ludvig Ipsen

Ernest Ipsen was born in Malden, Massachusetts, and studied painting at the Boston Art Museum and later at the Royal Academy in Copenhagen. He came to be a first-class portrait painter and was known all over the world.

He was elected to the Century Club in 1923, and he was always a faithful member. He painted the portrait of Elihu Root for the Club; and in 1948, when he was in his eightieth year, he won the Art Committee medal for the best picture in a professional exhibition in the art gallery. He also won the Lippincott prize for "Mr. Lauth and bottles" at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts Exhibition in 1936; the National Arts Club prize; and the Maynard prizes from the National Academy of Design. His portraits of famous people hang in public buildings and galleries and universities throughout America and Europe. He painted more Centurions than any painter that ever was.

Toward the end of his long life he lived at Coconut Grove in Florida, and for a decade we saw him very seldom.

Charles Keck

When Keck was a boy he was apprenticed to Philip Martini, one of the foremost decorative sculptors of America; and what he saw and learned with Martini, and a little later with Saint Gaudens, left a lasting impression on his work. When he was twenty-five he won the open competition for the Rome prize of the American Academy.

He became one of the best known sculptors of the country. He executed the statue of Father Duffy in Times Square and many other monuments, statues and memorial medals in every State of the Union. The range of his work was incredibly broad, and he was a past master at all of it.

He was a member of the Club for twenty years, and was affectionately known as Charley—which appellation fitted him to perfection. He always contributed to the members' exhibitions, and his particular heart's delight was to get together with kindred spirits at a round table at the monthly meetings.

To be a great sculptor is to bind the sweet influences of Pleiades and to loose the bands of Orion. The spiritual satisfactions are beyond measure: the happiness ineffable.

Stanley King

To few Centurions—or other mortals—is it given to be a leading industrialist, a distinguished public servant, and an outstanding college president. Stanley King was all of these.

Graduating brilliantly from Amherst in three years and, without precedent or successor, from the Harvard Law School in two (all they would give him was an M.A.), he early became one of New England's most forward-looking industrial leaders, combining the then novel principles of scientific management with sympathetic skill in handling labor relations.

It was natural that Newton Baker, as Secretary of War in World War I, should have made him his principal assistant in handling the urgent and unprecedented problems of industrial mobilization, and equally natural that he should have handled those problems with conspicuous success.

Many a man thinks, when he is young, that he will work hard in business until he has won security for himself and his family, and then use that security in the world of service to others. Stanley King is one of the few who have actually lived out that dream. Retiring from business, he made Amherst College, which had always been his avocation, his vocation, first as an energetic Trustee, and then as President from 1932 until his retirement in 1946.

The newspaper notices of his death emphasized the $10,000,000 added to the Amherst endowment during his presidency, and the ten new buildings—they might have added that his skillful and efficient management brought the College through the uncertainties of depression and war with an actual operating surplus.

These achievements, measurable in figures, may in the long run be less important than his strengthening of the faculty, his calm and unyielding defense of their freedom of teaching and freedom of action, and his stimulation and encouragement of the studies by faculty and alumni which led to Amherst's so-called New Curriculum, an imaginative experiment in educational correlation and integration which is attracting increasingly wide attention.

Stanley King was devoted to the Century. Few nonresident members were as fond as he was of dropping into West Forty-third Street and talking warmly with old friends and equally warmly with new friends. His lean, straight figure and animated face were always the center of an interested group of Centurions, not only of Amherst Centurions but of the many other friends he had in the Club. With his background of world-wide travel and extensive experience in business and in public life, he could and did talk intelligently and well on almost any subject, but sooner or later that subject would merge into his infectious enthusiasm for Amherst College. The generous remembrance to the Century in his will serve as an enduring memento to his affection for the Club.

Goodhue Livingston

Goodhue Livingston was born in the City of a long line of New York Livingstons. He graduated from Columbia in 1888, and four years later received his degree in architecture there.

In 1896 he made a partnership with Breck Trowbridge for the practise of architecture; and in the years that followed they designed some of the great landmarks in the City including Bankers Trust Company, the J. P. Morgan building and the addition to the Stock Exchange. They also built the Mitsui Bank in Tokyo and the United States Post Office and Court House in Pittsburgh. They were among the leading architects of the time and universally recognized as such.

Livingston was a cultured, civilized person, and an exceedingly competent architect. He had the vision to see the possibilities of steel sky-scraper construction, and to fit it to problems with economy and efficiency. His social life was effortless and pleasant, and he was active in many fields. He was a Trustee of the New York Dispensary, a Fellow of the American Institute of Architects and a member of the National Institute of Social Sciences.

He had a house at Southampton and he was there a great deal—especially in the later years—and he was President of the Southampton Club. It is such men as he who have made America great and preserved the best standards and ideals of the colonial stock.

He was eighty-four when he died, and he was a member of the Century for fifty-three years.

Augustus Peabody Loring, Jr.

Augustus Peabody Loring, Jr., of a family that since the end of the seventeenth century has had a finger in the legal and financial affairs of the Brahmin class, was perhaps the last of the great "Boston Trustees." He was, however, atypical. Ruddy, bustling, strikingly dégagé in his apparel, beaming with good will, one felt that his name could never have been anything but "Gus." The 1600 men and women that overflowed the First Unitarian Church at his funeral must have been a small fraction of the number of his fellow citizens that thought of him as, and called him, Gus.

As Chairman of the Board, Treasurer, Trustee or Director, he was an important figure in more than a score of Corporations, Learned Societies, Educational Institutions, and Charitable Foundations.

In action, as soon as anyone began to read a report Gus's eyes would close. He would breathe deeply and sway gently. From time to time a smile would pass over his rugged countenance as if he were dreaming of days in the thirty-foot ketch which was his summer delight. When the report was ended, however, or if there were a disputatious interruption, Gus was instantly awake and on the ball, usually with some illuminating or reconciling word based on wide experience and a singularly direct and reasonable mind. As a witness once in an important court case he was being badgered in cross-examination. "Your Honor," said Gus to the Judge, "I am getting confused." Said the Judge: "So am I."

No descendant of the Puritans was ever more interested in food and drink. At one time or another he was on the House Committee of five Boston Clubs: Always the kitchen, the cellar, even the cigar tray, became the better for him.

He was the genial host par excellance. One will always remember him mixing a third round of super-dry Martinis for twenty or thirty convives, carving a saddle of mutton with surgical nicety, or with a scholarly frown inspecting the label on a bottle of Burgundy.

He was marvellously homely. He worked hard. He seemed quite destitute of guile; but he could get men to do things he wanted when nobody else could. He knew the facts of life and the way of the world; and he did the things he ought to have done, and he was filled with health and goodness.

Trenholm Hatch Marshall

Trenholm H. Marshall was elected to the Century in 1946. He died February 6, 1951.

He graduated from Princeton in 1908, and from the Harvard Law School in 1911. He was a competent and highly successful lawyer, and practised diligently in New York till about ten years ago when an impaired heart compelled him to stop. After that he practised law in Greenwich, where he lived and where he was an exceedingly useful member of the community.

He was an alumni trustee of Princeton, a trustee of Rosemary Hall School in Greenwich, and a member of the Board of Greenwich Hospital. And, in addition, he did many ephemeral tasks that had to be done.

Tren was a short, stocky man with a pleasant face and a disarming smile. He combined a first-class intelligence with a courtesy which sometimes deceived the incautious into extravagances which made them look foolish when Tren's turn came; but he was a delightful and sympathetic companion and a loyal friend.

He was only 64 when he died—suddenly, of a heart attack. So, he got away ahead of the rest of us. We shall remember him and miss him.

Bryce Metcalf

Bryce Metcalf graduated from Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1898, intending to be an architect. He turned, however, to banking and became an executive of the International Banking Corporation. Some two decades ago he retired.

His lively interest was the Society of the Cincinnati; and for many years he was president of the Connecticut branch. This association is an hereditary military society formed by officers of the Continental Army in 1783, and its proceedings are of some historical significance. Colonel Metcalf also was a chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and a commander of the Italian Order of SS. Maurizio and Lazzaro.

He was a familiar figure in Army and Navy Club circles and among the old families of the City. He was somewhat formal in address and old-fashionedly punctilious in the observance of social conventions, but he was very friendly and always knew what he was talking about. After his wife died he lived at the Union Club.

Russell H. Nevins

Russell Nevins was elected to the Club in 1943 and died in 1951. He graduated from King's School in Stamford, and from Yale in 1901 where he was a Phi Beta Kappa scholar. He received a Master of Arts degree from Yale in 1907.

All his life he was a school-master. In 1902 he joined the faculty of St. George's School (Newport), and he retired in 1935. From 1926 to 1928 he was Headmaster.

After he retired he came to New York and lived at the University Club—he lodged there, but he spent his days at the Century when he was in town. He was a gentle, pleasant person: like Mr. Chips. He could always be counted on for a hand at bridge or as a companion in conversation in one of the corners of the Clubhouse.

Old boys stopped in to see him from time to time. He had taught Latin, and for some mysterious reason Latin teachers seem to acquire a grip on the affections of boys. The classics are a common medium of association and make for enduring ties.

His life was happy and filled with solid satisfactions. He loved boys and so he never had to grow old.

William Church Osborn

Mr. Osborn's contemporaries called him Will; but he lived a long time, and finally everybody except his descendants called him Mr. Osborn. He was very tall, and lean, and had a pleasant, resonant voice. He lived at Garrison; and he remarked, once, that the railroad station there was fairly littered up at train-time with giants belonging to the Fish and Osborn families.

He graduated from Princeton in 1883, and from the Harvard Law School in 1889. In 1942 Princeton gave him an LL.D. His considerable achievements as a lawyer were eclipsed by the importance of his services as a public figure. He was always a Democrat, and from 1914 to 1916 he was chairman of the Democratic State Committee. He was the ally and friend of Al Smith. In 1936, like many other responsible citizens, he was completely disgusted with the waste and boondoggling of the Administration, and in August he announced privately that he would vote Republican. Thereafter, however, he went to Bar Harbor for some weeks, and there he was so revolted by the smug complacency of the rich that he just couldn't do it.

He had a compelling sense of responsibility to the community, and this was tempered by hard common-sense and kindly humor. He was a member of the Board of the Metropolitan Museum for forty-five years, and he was a director of the Children's Aid Society for sixty years. These were his paramount interests: and the amount of harm that he prevented ill-advised enthusiasts from doing in these fields is incalculable. He saw the great city's crop of children as the most important thing in the world; and for them he won vital services in crowded neighborhoods where small feet sound the quick-step of the future.

He was a disciplined and tolerant person of complete integrity. Looking backward, it seems as though his stand on controversial public questions was always right—though not always adopted. Of course to be right is not enough; but for the truth as he saw it he fought a good fight.

His friends loved him. His opponents respected him. He had the qualities of John Hampden. He was at peace with himself.

Laurence Freeman Peck

Laurence Peck was elected to the Century in 1926. He died in 1951.

He was a graduate of Harvard in the class of 1904, and of the Beaux Arts in Paris. Most of his life he practised architecture in the City, but his real interest was in painting; and after a long time he completely quit architecture and took to painting pictures.

In 1950 his wife died; and Peck gave up painting for the time being, and put in a very busy year editing her letters and verses. He produced a remarkable book. With no previous experience he made himself responsible for its format, down to the smallest details of typography and printing style. It is a rich document—a kind of Taj Mahal of books—illustrated with photography of the life of an American family in the first half of the twentieth century.

Peck was very pleasant company. He played billiards well and often, and he spent a great deal of time in the Club in amiable and friendly discourse. He knew everybody, and was full of news and gossip about art and painters and the City generally.

William Procter

William Procter graduated from the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale in 1894, where he had taken the chemistry course. He was interested in science, but oppressed with a necessity of winning financial independence; and so for twenty years he conducted a bond office in the financial district of New York.

In 1920 he established a laboratory on Mt. Desert Island, and commenced his extraordinary biological survey of that Region. He not only supervised the work of the laboratory and prepared its publications, he was also an active participant in the collecting of specimens, and in their subsequent identification. In his 16-ton yacht "Lophius" he dredged at a vast number of stations, keeping record of the marine organisms recovered, and of the character of the bottom, the depth, and similar pertinent data. It was in the collecting of the insects of Mt. Desert Island, however, that he showed a zeal that was tireless. When he was not working in his laboratory, he was usually out searching for additional species to add to the impressive total that largely through his exploratory efforts were known to be denizens of Mt. Desert Island. In his final publication on The Insect Fauna he was able to record, with locality data and other jottings of scientific value, no less than 6578 species of insects and spiders, representing 2660 genera and 349 families—a remarkable total for so small a land mass even though, situated on the southern edge of the Boreal region and the northern line of what is known as the Transitional Zone of the Austral, Mt. Desert Island tends to be a meeting place for two different life-zones.

William Procter was on the whole a mellow conversationalist, notwithstanding an occasional crisp comment expressive of his sometimes impulsive dislikes. His reminiscences, ranging from the profound to the whimsical, were related with a joyously rippling fluidity. In his contacts with nature, he liked to get off the broad highway; and similarly in his reading he followed the side trails, preferring to make his own discoveries of merit rather than rendering homage to what had already received the acclaim of the moment, but had not yet been subjected to the test of time.

Beverley Randolph Robinson

Beverley Robinson was elected to the Club in 1905—only seven years out of Harvard College. He was a lawyer, and a founder of the Columbia Law Review. He served on the Board of Aldermen of the City and also was a member of the Assembly from the 27th District in New York.

Robinson was a conventional man. He belonged to a lot of clubs, bar associations and boards; but to each of them he brought something quite out of common. His presentation of his ideas was temperate but forceful; and to problems that came under consideration his contribution was always instinct with understanding and homely practicality.

He travelled a great deal in Europe, where he had many friends. He liked Europe and thoroughly knew his way about. Here and there he picked up marine prints, until finally he had a marvellous collection which he left to the Naval Academy.

The range of his interests was astonishing. He was a member of Phi Beta Kappa, and President of the Union Club; an Alderman, and President of the Museum of the City of New York; a practicing lawyer and member of the Grolier Club. His works were good works, and he did far more than his fair share for the City and its citizens.

Robinson was a delightful companion. He was well-educated, widely read, and invariably tolerant and polite. His voice had a curious cob-webby quality that is unforgettable. He was skeptical of new remedies for the ills of the world, and he accepted bad weather and human frailty as inevitable parts of the divine dispensation. He was a wise and mature person.

Francis Rogers

Francis Rogers graduated from the Roxbury Latin School in 1887 and from Harvard College in 1891. He was by birth and bringing up entirely New England. He was a member of the Century for more than forty years.

He was a singer all his life—a singer who could lift the hearts of men and make them see visions. A critic, after attending a concert where Rogers sang, wrote of him:

"What a song recital he can give. He can be somber or gay, merry or pathetic, tragic or humorous, and above all delicate and even subtle in suggestion. He is a master of style and an interpreter to whom all lyric and poetic doors easily open. There is no one else who sings the dainties of French songs with quite the exquisite finish which he obtains . . . Young singers ought always to go to Mr. Rogers' concerts. They can learn priceless lessons in song interpretation, in the economic use of material, the almost imperceptible tinging of tone, the scale of dynamics, which is so wide and impressive without containing a real forte. There is also much to be learned from Mr. Rogers' diction. This is a department of the vocal art of which he has made extensive and intensive study, and in which he is a recognized authority."

He gave recitals and concerts; and he sang many times at the Century for his friends. When he sang "Rolling Down to Rio" it was exciting beyond words. He had a kind of restraint, a suggestion of untapped reservoirs of emotion, that had the dynamic force of the calculated understatement. In this he was New England. There was a first-classness about his performances that seemed to set them apart from the general.

The first "Entertainment Party" sent to France in 1917 by the Y.M.C.A. consisted of Rogers as soloist, his wife, Cornelia Barnes Rogers—who gave original character sketches—and their accompanist Roger Lyon. Throughout the A.E.F. they were billed as "The Rogers Concert Party—Folks from Home." As President for many years of the American Committee of the Fontainebleau Fine Arts and Music Schools Association, he was awarded the medal of the French Legion d'Honneur. He was a director and officer of the Soldiers', Sailors' and Airmen's Club of New York.

Rogers was an aristocratic person, handsome, tall and with excellent manners. Withal, he was most pleasant company—understanding and kind and generous. As a member of the Club, he served on the Admissions Committee, the House Committee, the Nominating Committee, and the Board of Management, and to all these tasks he brought commonsense and patience and a capacity to get things done.

He never did a mean or cheap thing.

Theodore Sedgwick

Born into a family of old Unitarian tradition, Theodore Sedgwick, just out of Harvard College, embraced with eagerness the more militant faith of the Episcopal Church. From that moment, and even before, he saw with absolute clarity what his life's work should be. To give time for reflection, his father urged him to work for a year in civil life. He chose railroading, where his natural administrative gifts promised him early promotion. But his compass was fixed, and throughout his life, the needle never trembled from certainty. After three years in the Berkeley Seminary at Middletown, Connecticut, he was attracted by the fighting spirit of St. George's Church, which, under the masculine leadership of Dr. W. S. Rainsford, was waging unremittent war on the slums of New York. He had come to know the poor at first hand, and in dealing with boys and young men proved he had a way with him that won their life-long devotion. This was the bent he followed when he chose Williamstown, Massachusetts, as his first independent parish. Here he built his first church, and made among young men friendships which never loosened.

Called to larger things, he built the church of St. John the Evangelist at St. Paul, and made it the centre of a large and devoted congregation. There, too, he married the complete partner of his ministry, Miss May Aspinwall Bend.

The last parish at his prime was Calvary Church. Here for thirteen years he worked early and late accomplishing a peculiarly difficult task. Lower New York was transposing its church and it was long a question whether the Church at 22nd Street could hold its congregation then streaming northward. Dr. Sedgwick not only held it, but increased its members and immensely enjoyed its activities. It was not until retirement was approaching in 1924 that he took on the less exhausting burden of St. Andrew's Church, Yonkers.

One delightful duty was still in store for him. He was recalled from his retirement by the American Church in Rome. He loved the life, and the foreign colony gathered close about him.

During his last years he was called upon to suffer greatly, but to the end his spirit was strong.

Dr. Sedgwick was a Centurion born and made. His father and his three brothers all belonged to the Club and he never ceased to enjoy it.

His was a fortunate life: for, literally, thousands of other lives were changed because of his.

Clifford Melville Swan

Clifford M. Swan was elected to the Century in 1941, and he died in 1951. During this decade he was in poor health much of the time and came seldom to the Club, so that he was not a familiar figure there.

He graduated from Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1899 having completed the course in physics. He then took a post-graduate course at Harvard, working in the famous acoustical laboratory there under Dean Sabine. The latter was known among architects and engineers as "the father of architectural acoustics"; and Swan became enormously interested in the problems of sound in the interiors of buildings. He wrote a number of important papers in this connection, and laid the foundations of the profession that he later practised to such good effect.

He became an outstanding authority in America on acoustical problems. He solved these, not simply by the use of a slide-rule, but by adjustments of hangings, decorations, and proportions calculated in the most ingenious manner to eliminate reverberations or resonance. He fully understood that, whereas with the human voice the less reverberation the better, nevertheless with an organ, for instance, considerable reverberation is essential, and proper provision for an orchestra is somewhere between the two. The solution of such mixed requirements calls for a trained, experienced judgment that Swan possessed in a marked degree.

The most difficult problem in acoustics is presented by a spherical interior. Swan's solution of the case of the Perisphere at the New York World's Fair simply had the engineers agoggle; and withal was so simple and direct that it gave the same feelings of pleasure derived from a great work of art.

He lived at his home in Housatonic, and there he died.

Charles Triller

Charles Triller was elected to the Century in 1946. He was born in Poughkeepsie where he played the church organ as a boy. After he came to New York he founded the Society of American Singers, and for many years he was a director of the Manhattan School of Music.

In 1919 he was elected treasurer of the old Philharmonic Society; and when it merged with the New York Symphony to become the Philharmonic-Symphony Society he continued as treasurer. In 1945 he became chairman of the board. During his tenure the conductors included Rodzinski, Stokowski and Mitropoulos.

Triller was kind and understanding with musicians, and probably did more for them than any other man of his time. He knew more of the intimate history of music in the city than anyone else, and he was exceedingly important in the development of music organization.

He was a great traveller. In the course of a long life he made fifty-three trips abroad, where he climbed Alps and went to the Opera with Poultney Bigelow.

He was a pleasant companion and a generous friend. He lived simply—almost austerely—but he spent a great deal of money helping young musicians and old actors and supporting the Philharmonic.

Ernest Franklin Tyler

Ernest Tyler joined the Century in 1921; and he successively came to serve on every committee of the Club. Whenever he was in the City he came to the Club-house every day.

Sometimes he was in the pool-room, and sometimes in the Library; but mostly he would be found on the back porch in the summer, or when the days grew short at the round table in the East Room.

He studied at the Yale School of Fine Arts and Columbia School of Architecture, and after that he spent two years working in Paris. He was an architect; but his particular field was interior architecture. Some of his work is contained in Columbia University Dining Hall, the Morgan Library Annex, and the Supreme Court in Washington. He designed the Century Club flag and the book-plate. His paintings shown in the amateur exhibitions in the gallery were wholly out of the ordinary—especially his portraits, which were outstanding.

He was a perfect member. Everybody knew him and liked him, and everybody was glad to be with him. He was gentle and friendly and possessed of a whimsical humor that was disarming and wholly charming. He was filled with common sense.

He was a good friend. He had a good time.

Albert Henry Wiggin

Albert H. Wiggin was born in Medfield, Massachusetts, the son of a Unitarian clergyman and descendant of a family that came from England in 1631. He was a banker: and he joined the Chase Bank in 1904 as its youngest vice-president. He became president of it in 1911; and from that time he devoted himself to the interests and management of the Bank. In 1930 it became the largest banking institution in the world.

An achievement of this kind inevitably exacts a high price. Mr. Wiggin paid it. He had to spend his years thinking about money and listening to very dull men express themselves on boards of directors.

But Wiggin himself was not dull. He was a ball of fire. He was excited by what he was doing, and regarded it as important. And he could not have made the biggest bank in the world except he had vision and courage and capacity far out of the ordinary. His estimate of his fellow man was tinged with defeatism; but when the great financial crash came in 1930, he took the lead in expanding loans to enable victims to tide over the situation and to try and bolster public confidence.

He was an exceedingly able administrator. He served as head of the Clearing House Committee which raised $100,000,000 to protect New York City loans in London and Paris in the First World War; and he was State Fuel Administrator in the dreadful winter of 1917-18, when the Hudson froze over. He always seemed to know exactly what he was doing and where the difficulties lay.

In his home in New York he had a wonderful collection of prints, and to this he brought a technical competence and passionate interest that lifted him out of the world of Wall Street and set his feet in a large room.

Charles Mallory Williams

Dr. Williams was elected to the Club in 1951 and died the same year. He was a doctor, a recognized authority in dermatology. He took his medical degree at the College of Physicians and Surgeons (Columbia) in 1898; and many years later he taught clinical dermatology at the Post-Graduate Medical School of Columbia.

So late in life, so brief the occasion enjoyed within our membership, were his privileges as Centurion that few but old medical friends could establish new and firm friendships with him.

A New Englander to the core, salty in story and memories of his Stonington home, he was known as the elder citizen, the local historian, the man of colonial lineages, the gentle firm standard bearer of traditional culture. Adding to his medical concern with fellow men he brought discriminating delight in music and in books to all his companionships.

He was drawn out of his retirement from city practice too late for us to learn the full measure of the man. To those of long association his thoughts and way of life will long be cherished.

Francis Carter Wood

Long ago Dr. Wood was appointed Director of the Department of Clinical Pathology in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, then on West 59th Street. Here he developed new teaching methods for this rapidly growing field of medicine which were destined to revolutionize the whole approach to the problems. The study of disease no longer was limited to the sick room and the hospital ward, but was carried over to the laboratory and the research institute. In 1905 his "Chemical and Microscopical Diagnosis" was published, a treatise which remained the most complete and authoritative in its field for many years.

Meanwhile his investigative mind was turning more and more to the problem of cancer; and in 1913 the Crocker Institute for Cancer Research at Columbia University was opened under his guidance as Director. The building, constructed as he planned it without any unnecessary elaboration, was in conformity with his opinion that "research funds should be spent on brains and not on buildings." From this simple but efficiently designed structure there emanated during more than a quarter of a century, until his enforced retirement on reaching the age limit, information of the first importance with regard to the nature and causes of cancerous growths and their response to treatment by radiation or other agencies. The caustic asperity of his criticisms directed against claims of alleged cancer cures inspired by premature optimism, or less creditable motives, was in sharp contrast to the warm hearted kindliness of his attitude toward patients coming for treatment in the Department of Radiotherapy which he established and conducted at St. Luke's Hospital.

During recent years he had been engrossed in the creation of a monumental "Atlas of Tumor Pathology" to be illustrated with 1,500 or more microphotographs prepared by himself. Happily he was able to carry the work almost to completion, and it is expected that its publication will not long be delayed.

No mere record of achievements can give an adequate picture of him. He was far more than learned; his mind was ever sparkling and his conversation spiced with a special pungency of original phrase and aphorism. An outstanding figure in the development of medicine during the past fifty years—of national and international prominence—there was also in him a grace and captivating charm that made him the most delightful of companions. To his students and assistants he appeared a paragon of knowledge, unique and inimitable. With a sort of affectionate possessiveness they always spoke of him as "The Professor": and as such he will live in the devoted memories of countless numbers.

ACTS OF INCORPORATION

CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS

AN ACT TO INCORPORATE THE CENTURY ASSOCIATION

PASSED MARCH 7, 1857

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

§ 1. Gulian C. Verplanck, William C. Bryant, Charles M. Leupp, Asher B. Durand, John F. Kensett, William Kemble, and William H. Appleton, and such other persons as are now associated as "The Century," or may hereafter become associated with them, are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name of "THE CENTURY ASSOCIATION," to be located in the City of New York, for the purpose of promoting the advancement of Art and Literature, by establishing and maintaining a library, reading room, and gallery of art, and by such other means as shall be expedient and proper for that purpose.

§ 2. The said corporation shall have the power to make and adopt a Constitution and By-Laws, Rules, and Regulations, for the admission, government, suspension, and expulsion of its members, the election of its officers and to define their duties, and for the safe-keeping and protection of its property and funds; and from time to time to alter or repeal such Constitution, By-Laws, Rules, and Regulations. The seven persons named in the first section of this Act shall constitute the Trustees and Managers until others are elected in their places.

§ 3. The said corporation may purchase and hold or lease any real or personal estate, provided that they shall not hold any real estate the value of which shall exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars.

§ 4. The said corporation shall possess the general powers, and be subject to the general restrictions and liabilities prescribed in the third title of the eighteenth chapter of the first part of the Revised Statutes.

§ 5. The Legislature may at any time alter or repeal this Act.

§ 6. This Act shall take effect immediately.

By a special Act of the Legislature, passed March 29th, 1883, the Association was authorized to hold real estate to the value of three hundred thousand dollars. This was superseded by the general Corporation Law, under which the Association is entitled to hold real estate to the value of three million dollars.

THE CENTURY ASSOCIATION

ARTICLE I

THIS Association shall be composed of authors, artists, and amateurs of letters and the fine arts.

ARTICLE II

§ 1. The officers shall be a President, two Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, and a Treasurer; and there shall also be sixteen Trustees. Such officers, together with the Trustees, shall be a Board of Management. Of the Trustees not less than three shall be authors, not less than three artists, and not more than eight amateurs. No person shall be eligible as a trustee for more than three years in succession.

The officers and trustees shall be chosen at each annual meeting by ballot, and shall continue in office until the next annual meeting, or until their successors are elected.

§ 2. The President shall preside at the meetings of the Association; he shall also be Chairman of the Board of Management; he shall, with the Secretary, sign all written contracts and obligations of the Association, and he shall perform such other duties as the Board of Management of the Association may assign him.

The First Vice-President, or in his absence the Second Vice-President, shall discharge the duties of the President in case of his absence or during a vacancy in his office.

§ 3. The Secretary shall keep minutes of all meetings of the Association and of the Board of Management; shall notify members of their election, issue notices for all meetings of the Association, and conduct the correspondence and keep the records; which records and correspondence shall be open to the inspection of members at all reasonable times.

§ 4. The Treasurer shall collect and, under the direction of the Board of Management, disburse the funds. He shall report at the monthly meeting in February and oftener if required, on the state of the funds. His accounts shall be audited by a select committee of three, appointed or elected at the monthly meeting next previous to the annual meeting.

In case of the absence, disability, or death of the Treasurer, the President or the Board of Management shall have power to appoint a Treasurer pro tem, to serve during such absence or disability, or, in case of the death of the Treasurer, until the vacancy shall have been filled.

§ 5. Any officer or trustee may be removed, for cause, at any meeting of the Association, upon due notice, and any vacancy in an office shall be filled for the residue of the term by the Board of Management.

ARTICLE III

Of the Powers of the Association at its General Meetings

§ 1. All the corporate powers remain vested in the Association, and they may be exercised at any regular meeting, subject to the restrictions herein contained.

§ 2. No resolution making any disposition by way of sale, lease, or mortgage, of any of the property of the Association, or whereby an expenditure of more than two hundred and fifty dollars is or may be incurred, shall be passed except at a meeting at which sixty members shall be present, and two-thirds of those present shall vote in favor thereof, nor until the resolution shall have been referred to and considered by the Board of Management and they shall have reported their opinion thereon, which report shall be made at the monthly meeting next after the reference.

ARTICLE IV

Of the Board of Management

§ 1. The Board of Management shall have general charge of the affairs, funds, and property of the Association. It shall be their duty to carry out the objects and purposes thereof; and to this end they may exercise all the powers of the Association, subject to the Constitution and By-Laws, and to such action as the Association may take at its monthly or annual meetings.

§ 2. The Board of Management shall have regular meetings as often as once in each month from November to June inclusive, and they shall submit a report of the affairs of the Association at each annual meeting, and shall report at other times if required. Seven members shall constitute a quorum.

§ 3. The Board of Management may invite distinguished strangers visiting the City to partake of the privileges of the Association during their stay. [Amended December 3, 1921.]

§ 4. The Board of Management shall have the power to remit the dues of any member, for such cause and for such period as in their judgment may be advisable and proper. During that period such member shall not be counted in the limitation of members. [Amended December 3, 1921.]

ARTICLE V

Of Committees and their Duties

§ 1. Committee on Admissions. The Committee on Admissions shall consist of twenty-one members, who shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting, and shall hold office until their successors shall be elected. At the annual meeting in January, 1889, seven members of the Committee shall be elected to serve three years, seven two years, and seven one year. At each subsequent annual meeting seven members shall be chosen to serve three years. No member of the Committee shall be eligible for re-election within one year of the expiration of three years' service on said Committee. Vacancies by death, or otherwise, may be filled by the Committee until the next annual meeting. They shall fix their own time and place of meeting. Eleven members shall constitute a quorum.

§ 2. Other Committees. There shall be a House Committee and a Committee on Literature, each composed of three members of the Board of Management. There shall be an Art Committee composed of at least seven members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Board of Management. These Committees shall be appointed by the Board of Management within two weeks after each annual meeting. The Board may provide for the appointment of additional members of any of said Committees from time to time; such additional members need not be members of the Board. The particular duties of each of said Committees shall be defined by the By-Laws. [Amended March 3, 1934.]

ARTICLE VI

Of the Members

§ 1. The number of resident members is limited to one thousand.

§ 2. Any member who, having paid the entrance fee and the dues for one year, is absent from the United States for a continuous period of not less than twelve months shall, during his absence, be exempt from the payment of dues, provided that he shall have given to the Treasurer previous notice in writing of his intention to be absent. Absentees shall not be counted in the limitation of the number of resident members. In case the return of absentees shall increase the number above the limit prescribed, no new resident members shall be chosen until the number shall be reduced by resignation or otherwise below such limit.

§ 3. There shall also be a class of non-resident members, not exceeding seven hundred in number, to consist of persons residing permanently more than fifty miles from New York City Hall, and having no office or place of business in New York. [Amended March 1, 1945.]

All members of the Armed Forces of the United States, who are now members or who may be elected to membership, may at their option be held to be non-resident members during their active service. [Amended March 1, 1945.]

An artist member who has paid an entrance fee as a resident member may at his option elect to be classified as a non-resident member and be liable for annual dues as such but shall remain entitled to all the privileges of the Association, including the right of voting and of holding office. [Amended April 3, 1947.]

§ 4. No person shall be admitted as a member of the Association unless he shall have been recommended by the Committee on Admissions, on the proposal of two members not belonging to that Committee.

The name of every person proposed for admission, whether as a resident or a non-resident member, with his residence and the names of the members proposing him, shall be posted in the rooms at least fifteen days before being acted upon by the Committee. The Committee shall receive and consider all communications in reference to the persons proposed, and make careful examination as to their qualifications; it shall pass upon each name separately, and two negative votes shall be a rejection of the candidate. The proceedings of the Committee shall be secret and confidential.

At every monthly meeting of the Association the Committee shall furnish printed lists, properly classified, of the names of the persons recommended for admission, not exceeding twenty in number, and the Association shall then proceed to vote by depositing the lists with tellers appointed by the Chairman. The erasure from the list of any name shall be considered a vote in the negative, and such negative votes to the number of one-fifth of the votes cast shall exclude from membership the person against whom they are cast.

No person so excluded shall be eligible for election within twelve months thereafter.

§ 5. Non-resident members may at any time, on and after the 30th April, 1896, be transferred from the list of resident members upon application in writing to the Treasurer. The members so transferred shall not be entitled to reimbursement of any part of the entrance fee.

Non-resident members shall be entitled to all the privileges of the Association, except the right of voting and of holding office. They shall be subject to the Constitution and By-Laws and to all the regulations of the Association.

§ 6. The Secretary and Treasurer, two weeks previous to each monthly meeting, shall determine the number of vacancies in each class of members and certify the same to the Committee on Admissions.

§ 7. An entrance fee of one hundred and fifty dollars shall be paid by each resident member, and of one hundred dollars by each non-resident member.

Such payment shall be made within thirty days after notice in writing of his election; or if within thirty days after such notice the member gives written notice to the Treasurer of his desire to do so, such payment may be made in four instalments, each of one quarter of the amount of the entrance fee; the first instalment shall be payable within thirty days after notice of his election, the second instalment within six months after such notice, the third instalment within twelve months after such notice, and the fourth instalment within eighteen months after such notice.

In default of such payment of the entrance fee, or the first instalment thereof, within thirty days after such notice, the member shall be deemed to have declined his election unless the Board of Management determines otherwise.

If any member fails to pay a subsequent instalment of his entrance fee when due, he shall be notified thereof in writing, and unless such instalment shall be paid within one month after such notice he shall thereupon cease to be a member unless the Board of Management determines otherwise. [Amended January 14, 1939.]

§ 8. The annual dues of resident members shall be one hundred twenty-five dollars, payable semi-annually in advance on the first days of May and November; and the annual dues of non-resident members shall be sixty-two and one-half dollars, payable on admission, and on each first day of May thereafter. [Amended March 6, 1947.]

The dues of all newly-elected members shall be computed proportionally from the first day of the month succeeding their election.

When the dues of any member shall remain unpaid for the space of three months, the Treasurer shall cause him to be notified that, unless the same be paid within one month thereafter, his membership will cease; and in case such dues shall not be paid pursuant to such notice, or such default be accounted for to the Board of Management, he shall thereupon cease to be a member.

In case any member of the non-resident class other than an artist member shall come to reside within the radius above named, or shall establish an office or place of business in the City of New York, it shall be his duty forthwith to notify the Treasurer of the Association in writing of such change, and he shall then be deemed a resident member with annual dues accordingly, and unless he has already paid the entrance fee of a resident member, he shall also pay to the Treasurer within thirty days the additional amount of entrance fees necessary to constitute him a resident member; in default of such payment he shall cease to be a member. [Amended March 6, 1947.]

It shall be the duty of each member to keep the Treasurer informed of his address.

§ 9. Honorary members may be elected from the membership of the Association on the recommendation of the Board of Management, at a regular monthly meeting, by unanimous vote by ballot. No more than one honorary member shall be chosen in any one year. Honorary members shall be exempt from the payment of annual dues and shall be entitled to all the privileges of the Association except that of holding office.

§ 10. Any member may be suspended or expelled for violation of the Constitution or By-Laws, or for any offence or misconduct which may be deemed sufficient to warrant such suspension or expulsion, by a vote, at a monthly meeting, of three-fourths of the members present, one month's previous notice having been given to the member charged. It shall be the duty of the Board of Management to report any member for action under this rule.

The Board of Management shall also have the power for a like cause, by the affirmative vote of eleven (11) of its members, after a hearing has been granted on one month's previous notice, to suspend any member from all privileges as such member indefinitely, pending further action; but any member affected thereby may require the resolution of suspension to be reported to the Association.

Membership may also be forfeited by failure to pay any indebtedness to the Association, in such manner as may be prescribed by the By-Laws.

§ 11. In the rooms of the Association, betting of any kind is strictly prohibited. [Amended November 5, 1927.]

ARTICLE VII

Of Meetings

§ 1. There shall be an annual meeting of the Association for the election of officers and members and other business. It shall be held on the second Thursday of January of each year, at 9 o'clock P.M.

§ 2. There shall be monthly meetings of the Association for the election of members and other business. They shall be held on the first Thursday of November, December, February, March, April, May and June at 9 o'clock P.M. [Amended June 3, 1941.]

§ 3. Special meetings may be called by the Board of Management; and they shall call a meeting at any time on the written request of ten members, which request shall specify the object of the meeting.

§ 4. The number of members necessary to constitute a quorum at an annual meeting shall be fifty, and at a monthly or special meeting shall be thirty.

ARTICLE VIII

Of Amendments

§ 1. This Constitution shall commence and take effect on the second Saturday of January, 1870, and the previous Constitution thereupon shall cease.

§ 2. No alteration or amendment of this Constitution shall be made unless the same be proposed at a previous regular meeting, and then posted in a conspicuous place in the rooms of the Association and the text of the same sent to each voting member with the notice of the meeting at which it may be considered, and be finally adopted at a subsequent meeting by the votes of two-thirds of the members present at the passage thereof.

§ 3. By-Laws, Rules, and Regulations, not inconsistent with the Charter or this Constitution, may be made, adopted, altered, or repealed at any monthly or annual meeting; provided, the proposed by-law, rule, regulation, alteration, or repeal shall have been proposed at a previous monthly meeting, and then posted in a conspicuous place in the rooms of the Association and the text of the same sent to each voting member with the notice of the meetings at which it may be considered, and shall be adopted by the votes of two-thirds of the members present at the passage thereof.

BY-LAWS

§ 1. No book, journal, paper, picture, statue, or other work of art, the property of the Association, shall be taken from the rooms, under any pretext whatever, except by authority of the Board of Management.

§ 2. On the first day of each month or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, there shall be sent to each member notice of his indebtedness to the Association on the last day of the preceding month, and if the same is not paid on or before the fifteenth day of the month the names of the members so in default, together with the amounts due, shall be posted on a separate sheet in the hall.

In case any such indebtedness shall not be discharged at the expiration of a month from the date of such first notice, a second notice shall be mailed to the member in default, notifying him that further credit will not be extended to him until his indebtedness is discharged, and that in case he continues in such default for ten days thereafter, he will be excluded from all privileges of the Association until such indebtedness is paid, and such member shall thereupon, upon the expiration of such ten days, be so excluded, and notice to that effect shall thereupon be posted on a separate sheet in the hall.

At any time during such exclusion the Board of Management may declare the membership of such delinquent to be forfeited, and his name shall thereupon be dropped from the roll of members.

But before such action shall be taken by the Board of Management, it shall cause a copy of this By-Law to be mailed to the delinquent member.

A copy of this By-Law shall be sent with such second notice.

§ 3. A suggestion book shall be kept at the rooms in which every member is authorized to enter, under his signature, any complaint as to the management of the Association, and any suggestions he may desire to make.

§ 4. Visitors:

(a) A member may introduce a guest to the rooms of the Association for one day by entering the name and address of such guest and the date in the book to be kept for that purpose. This privilege may be suspended for any particular day by the House Committee. A member may not introduce the same person as a daily guest more than twice in the calendar year, and may not introduce more than one daily guest on the same day.

(b) A member may invite visitors to the Art Gallery during any Art Exhibition of the Association through signing cards of invitation printed for that purpose, but such cards of invitation shall not entitle visitors to pass to other parts of the house.

(c) A member may introduce guests to the private dining room when he has reserved that room for an entertainment.

(d) The House Committee, at the request in writing of a member, may extend the privileges of the Association for a total period of one month in any twelve months to a guest whose residence is more than fifty miles from the City Hall. Extension of this time may, on the recommendation of the House Committee, be granted by the Board of Management.

A member may not obtain from the House Committee such privileges for more than one guest at a time, nor for the same guest more than once in a period of twelve months.

(e) Guests while enjoying the privileges of the Association as provided in paragraphs (a) and (d) are on the same footing as non-resident members, except that they may not introduce visitors and may not be present at any business meeting of the Association. Nor shall the House Committee grant the same privileges to the same guest more than once in a period of twelve months.

(f) A member who obtains admission to the club-house for a guest becomes responsible for the conduct of such guest and for any indebtedness of such guest to the Association.

(g) The Board of Management may modify these rules to meet special cases.

(h) It is the duty of the House Committee to enforce the provisions of this section and promptly to report to the Board of Management all cases of persistent violation thereof.

(i) In case of violation of any of the provisions of this section, the House Committee may summarily suspend the privileges accorded therein with regard to any member or visitor for a period not exceeding ten days, and in all cases of violation the Board of Management may suspend such privileges for such period as in their discretion the interest of the Association may require.

(j) In addition to the powers herein above granted, the Board of Management may provide for the invitation of authors, artists, and composers of music to be guests of the Association. Such invitations shall be for the term of one year but shall be renewable; and the total number so invited shall not exceed fifty at any one time. [Amended November 5, 1942.]

§ 5. The House Committee shall have the charge of furnishing supplies, employing stewards and servants, keeping the rooms and premises of the Association in order for use, regulating the place, character and the extent of recreation and amusements in the club-house, and enforcing the rule as to admission of visitors. [Amended November 5, 1927.]

The care of newspapers and current periodicals is entrusted to the House Committee.

§ 6. The Committee on Literature shall have charge of the Library, and of the supply of books, and shall subscribe for periodicals and newspapers. Loud or continuous conversation shall not be carried on in the Library, nor, except on Thursday nights, shall refreshments be served therein.

§ 7. The Committee on Art shall have charge of all works of art owned or possessed by the Association; and it shall be their duty to make arrangements for exhibition, at monthly and annual meetings, of the works of artists of the Association, and other works of art, at their discretion. They shall keep a catalogue of the works of art owned or possessed by the Association, or exhibited in its rooms, and shall record therein every such work, with the name of the author, the title of the work, and the time of exhibition. The Committee on Art shall have charge of all decorations of the rooms. No work of art shall be accepted as a gift, or purchased by the Association, until the Committee on Art has made a report thereon to the Board of Management.

§ 8. The expenditures of the House Committee, and the Committees on Literature and Art, shall be limited to such sums as the Board of Management shall prescribe.

§ 9. A perfect list of members, officers, and committees shall be kept posted up in the rooms of the Association; and such list shall be corrected under the direction of the Treasurer and Secretary, from time to time, as changes occur.

§ 10. The above By-Laws shall go into effect on the second Saturday of January, 1870.

§ 11. A Nominating Committee shall annually be constituted as follows. The Board of Management shall at its last spring meeting propose as candidates for such committee the names of seven members of the Club, of whom two shall be members of the Board of Management, not eligible for re-election, and two shall be members of the Committee on Admissions. The names shall be posted in the club-house at least twenty days before the November monthly meeting of the Club. At any time not later than ten days before the November monthly meeting, additional candidates may be proposed for the Committee, provided that in each case the proposal, indorsed by twenty-five resident members, be presented in writing to the Secretary of the Club.

All the names proposed by either of the above methods shall be printed in a single list, the names proposed by the Board of Management being designated by an asterisk. From this list, which shall be distributed at the monthly meeting in November, the Club shall elect by ballot the Nominating Committee. Each member may vote for not more than seven names on the list, and the seven candidates receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected.

The Nominating Committee shall at the earliest practicable moment post in the club-house the names of candidates for all the positions to be filled. Additional candidates for such positions or any of them, may be nominated, and shall be posted, provided that in each case the nomination, indorsed by fifty resident members, be presented in writing to the Secretary of the Club not later than one week before the Annual Meeting.

The Secretary of the Club shall prepare printed lists of all candidates named by either of the aforesaid methods, the names to be grouped under the titles of the positions to be filled; the candidates for Trustees to be arranged in three groups, designated respectively as Authors, Artists, and Amateurs, and all names proposed by the Nominating Committee to be designated by an asterisk. These lists shall be distributed to members at the Annual Meeting, and shall serve as ballots in the election, provided that nothing herein be construed to restrict the right of any member to vote by means of written names for persons whose names do not appear in print. [Amended May 1, 1952]

§ 12. An Investment Committee consisting of four members and the Treasurer shall be appointed by the Board of Management annually. It shall be the duty of this committee to supervise the investments of the Club and to advise the Treasurer with respect to the purchase and sale of its investments.

AMENDED, DECEMBER, JANUARY 13, 1947

I

THE name, residence, and profession or occupation of every candidate for membership in this Association shall be entered in the Book of Candidates kept for this purpose; such entry shall be accompanied by the signatures of the proposer and seconder. The Secretary of the Committee may make such entry upon written request by the proposer or seconder, and may sign their names upon their respective authorizations.

II

The proposer of a candidate shall send promptly a letter of recommendation to the Secretary of the Committee on Admissions, giving the name, place of residence, and profession or occupation of the candidate, with such statement of his qualifications as the proposer may deem proper. The seconder shall likewise send a letter of recommendation.

III

A candidacy shall be deemed completed as of the date when the entry in the Book of Candidates shall have been made as provided in Rule I of the Committee and when the Secretary of the Committee shall have received the letters of recommendation from the proposer and seconder. The Secretary shall thereupon enter in the Book of Candidates the date of the completed candidacy, and shall add the candidate's name to the posted list.

Form of Bequest

I give and bequeath to The Century Association, of the City of New York, a New York corporation, the sum of $_____.
